Benn plea threatens Kinnock unity bid

By Philip Webster and David Felton

As Mr Neil Kinnock attempted yesterday to secure wider union backing for the plan to allow the reselection of Labour MPs by the full membership of local parties, Mr Tony Benn opened up the prospect of another phase of internal constitutional argument by asking the left to campaign for elections to Labour's shadow cabinet to be taken away from MPs and given to an electoral college.

Mr Kinnock was involved in behind-the-scenes moves to persuade the Transport and General Workers' Union delegation to next week's Labour conference in Blackpool to reject the advice of its executive and back the one member-one vote plan.

Although Mr Kinnock is confident he can win Monday's vote without the backing of the TGWU, he is anxious to secure as large a majority as possible on an issue which has inevi-tably come to be seen as a test of his leadership.

He is determined to resist calls, renewed yesterday, to retreat. But he is understood to have offered transport union leaders, in return for a vote in principle in favour of one member one vote, a year's grace in which the possible imperfections in the proposals could be looked at and guidelines drawn

If accepted, the deal would go some way towards meeting the demands of critics who have argued for delay, but it would still give the Labour leader a significant vote in favour of the

The next round of reselections is due to begin in December but Mr Kinnock's view apparently is that local parties would be unlikely to rush the procedure if they knew that guidelines were being drawn up. Those parties bent

because they are optional.

Mr Benn's proposal for a change in the method of electing the shadow cabinet came as many in the party were hoping that the constitutional disputes were at last ending His idea would mean that the election of the shadow cabinet would be taken from the parliamentary party, which is still dominated by the centreright, and given to an electoral college, as already happens for leadership and deputy leadership elections.

It came in an interview in the left-wing Labour Herald in which Mr Benn also urged that any decision on the reselection role change be deferred. He said: "There is, however, democratic reform we shall have to promote soon. That is cabinet by electoral college. You cannot have a party with two centres of power, as it is

"I think the bishops are bound to speak out about public offairs ... because serious state of division in the country." The Archbishop of Canterbury was at one and the same time proclaiming a truth and begging the question when he made this comment on the BBC's Today programme yes-

Even those who are most outraged by the Bishop of Durham's sermon should ac-cept the right of bishops to speak out on public affairs. If that right were to be denied, how could one logically ap-plaud the outrage of Roman Catholic bishops in Polaud who protest against communist

Of course, the circumstances is the point. It is not wrong in principle for the bishops to speak on political issues. It lepends on the circumstances. This is the question that Dr

Runcie could not be expected to answer in a brief radio interview. But it is, I believe, the central question that needs to be examined calmly in the aftermath of the forore provoked by Dr Jenkins: when and where is it appropriate for a bishop to enter the political

A previous and much loved Archbishop of Canterbury, William Temple, wrote in Christianity and the Social Order, published in 1942: "It is of crucial importance that the Church acting corporately should not commit itself to any particular policy. A policy always depends on technical decisions concerning the actual relations of cause and effect in the political and economic world.

Temple was himself a highly political churchman with leftof-centre opinions. He was not arguing that the clergy as individuals should abstain from political controversy.

Afraid of Church causing offence

But he was afraid of the Church as an institution making an ass of itself in fields where it could claim no valid authority, or causing hurt and offence to those of its members who might sincerely disagree The Gospel is not, after all, an infallible guide to exchange

It might be argued that these ropositions nonetheless offer a instification for Dr Jenkins, ecause he was speaking as an individual churchman. But Temple went on to write. referring specifically to indus-trial conflicts, that "it could harldy ever be right for the Church or ecclesiastical persons as such to propose terms for the solution of a dispute, because they lack the specialist knowledge required".

The phrase "ecclesiastical persons as such" is worth noting. I take it to mean someone deliberately using the authority of his ecclesiastical office to peddle his own prescription. That is what Dr Jenkins did. He was proposing dispute, and there can be few occasions when a bishop can use the authority of his office more deliberately than in his enthronement sermon. However delicately he had referred to Mr MacGregor, Dr Jenkins would still have been erring in this broader respect. The bishop of Peterborough was surely right to suggest that such political statements could more appropriately be made in the house of Lords, though one rould add television or radio interviews, newspaper articles bishop would not seem to be deliberately invoking the auth-double dilemma. Apart from reservations over the effect of Does this rule out, then, any strike action at Newcastle, there is also a measure of doubt over comments on the miners' strike from the pulpit? Not at all. Dr a call for supportive action by other computer operators at Reading and Livingston, sched-uled to take place from October Jenkins's brief reference to the violence of the pickets, "civil violence for group ends", was not out of place. Nor could one have objected in principle if the today have to decide whether it bishop had thought it necessary is just to subsidize members at

One would have thought that he had got it wrong, but not that he was in the wrong to say such a thing on such an occasion. He would have been making a moral protest on an issue that did not require technical expertise.

But what if there is now a mood of hostility within the Church towards the moral values of the present Govern-ment? Would that not justify a more general moral protest, and from the pulpit too?

If the Church has indeed concluded that the policies of the democratically elected government of this country are morally unacceptable, then it has a duty to speak out. But it does need to think carefully. It could so easily find that it had weakened its voice of moral protest by indulging in political rhetoric.

Switch to roads by British Steel may cost BR millions

British Rail stands to lose

cision to switch much business from rail to road.

econd biggest customer after the Central Electricity Generating Board, has had to find alternatives to the railways during the miners' strike. The contract to move coal by rail from South Wales pits to The Llanwern steel works is almost certain not to be renewed and there are doubts over how coal' will be delivered to the Ravenscraig works in Scotland when the miners' dispute is settled.

The loss of the main part of BSC's coal-moving business would pose a serious threat to the viability of BR's freight operations and again presents the Government with a problem over state-funding of the railways.

Rail unions have refused to move coal to the integrated steelworks almost from the start of the miners' strike and with seven months experience of operating lorry convoys, BSC believes that the cost is only marginally in favour of rail. But senior BSC executives are convinced that this is outweighed by the greater flexi-bility of road haulage. One said that when rail contracts came up for renewal, BR could not be guaranteed the business: "Life will never be the

"The road hanlage system coal-hauling contracts worth has had a fair bit of hammering, many millions of pounds after a but operators have stuck with ms and we are not going to turn our back on them. They have made money out of this, but British Steel, which is BR's they have helped to keep us going."

BSC's other rail contracts, covering in particular the distribution of finished products, have been unaffected.

Despite the miners' attempts to close steelworks, BSC has managed to maintain output at a rate of just under 300,000 tonnes a week this year, about 8,000 tonnes a week up on the same period of 1983.

The corporation also believes that its losses of £3,500,000 to £4m a week are entirely due to the impact of the strike, and the falling pound. Most of BSC's raw materials are priced in BSC's road haulage plan could encounter opposition from several unions (Barrie ment writes).

Mr Arthur Scargill, president of the National Union of Mineworkers, indicated at the start of the pit strike that any union taking supportive action would be guarantedd backing by his members in the event of what he called retribution by Rail unions would oppose the plan and call on the Transport and General Workers' Union, with its considerable forry driver membership, to black any attempt to switch contracts.

Nations not united over dairy products

If everyone drank as much milk as the Icelanders, ate as much butter as the Irish and as much cheese as the French, not only would it end the dairy surplus but would create an acute shortage.

That is clear from figure s published in the latest issue of Milk Producer, the journal of the Milk Marketing Board, which show remarkable differences in national consumption. For example, Icelanders drink well over a pint a day, more than twice as much as Americans and three times as much as Germans.

The French do not drink much milk but they eat an average of nearly 20 kilograms (44 lbs) of cheese each a year, and only the Irish eat more butter. Other enthusiastic cheese eaters are the Icelanders (again), Swedes, Germans and

Labour Party and the miners

Struggle 'to defend all our futures'

Party National Executive Committee for next week's party conference reads as

1 The Labour Party declares its full support for miners in their struggle to defend the coal mining industry. The miners are trying to safeguare all our futures; to ensure the continued availability of Britain's most precious and adaptable national resource; to protect reserves which provide not only the windle begin for companie expension. viable basis for economic expansion and jobs in the future - and the only possible foundation for a sound. environmentally safe strategy for energy.

2 We support the NUM in their determination to sustain collieries and jobs and save our coal mining communities. The Tory plan to run down the industry must be resisted. For if we are to safeguard Britain's future, coal production must be expanded - not contracted - towards the targets set out in Labour's Plan for Coal.

Labour's Plan for Coal.

3 Since May 1979, the coal mining industry has seen the closure of nearly 50 pits, and the loss of more than 50,000 jobs. The proposals for lower production targets – initiated by Ian MacGregor at the behest of the Tory Government. mean closing another 70 pits, and the loss of another 70,000 jobs, and 20, of these pits and 20,000 of the jobs would go in the space of just 12 months.

Role as feed stock for oil

4 The NCB proposals cannot be justified on social, economic, or environmental grounds: • They will mean social devas-

the coalfields lying in areas of high unemployment, there is little or no chance of alternative work for miners made redundant. It will mean soaring unemployment in the coal fields, families without livelihoods, social and community decay with all the associated costs to the communities concerned. And, in areas already deeply scarred by deprivation, there will be a bitter intensification of poverty.

They will cost the nation thousands of millions of pounds in terms of redundancy payments and social security benefits for redundant miners; in lost tax revenues and in extra rent and rate rebates sums that will completely dwarf any accountancy "savings" made by the coal board in closing pits. The NUM have shown against the £2.400m which might be "saved" by the closures over a 10-year period. the cost to public funds could be as much as £4.200m.

 They could mean a decisive shift towards an over-dependance on nuclear power. And this would happen despite all the problems, known and yet to emerge - of pollution and contamination, of threats to health and safety and of enough for hundreds of years, even under conditions of rapid economic expansion, reserves which will easily outlive our oil and gas.

6 Britain has to begin planning now for the time when our oil and gas reserves begin to run out - as they most certainly will in the not very distant future. Without the availassam tuture. Without the 2/21-ability of our own coal and oil - a future where it would be difficult, perhaps imposible, to get Britain fully back to work. But it would also mean a new dangerous and foolhardy dependence on nuclear power. It is a future that will not

7 That there has been a fall in demand for coal in Britain cannot, of course, be denied. But the reason for that fall in demand cannot be denied either – namely the devastating economic failures of the Tory Government a massive slump in output, an at least four million men and women out of work – and hence a huge 20 per cent fall in domestic energy consumption. This domestic energy consumption. This is why Labour's central priority must be to rebuild the economy and put Britain back to work. Yet, if Britain is ever to regain her industrial strength, if we are ever to find work for our people the parior find work for our people, the nation must be able to rely on a thriving expanding coal industry.

8 The Government's first priority now must be to ensure that the-industry is able to maintain ist capacity despite the ravages of the recession: and this means providing an adequate level of operating subsidies. We make no apologies for substales. We make no approprie for a high level of support for the coal industry. For with every pit which is closed — and, which still has some productive life - there is a permanent loss of Britain's coal reserves. And, in addition, there is also the need to provide support to men who will be prevented by the closures from earning their living -far more than would be needed if we

• It makes sense to provide resources to maintain Britain's reserves of coal, just as it makes sense to prolong our reserves of gas, as the Government is doing by encouraging British Gas to buy imported gas from Norway in the early 1990s - despite the fact that it will cost much more than our gas

 It makes sense to defend the competitiveness of British coal against the heavily-subsidized output from our competitors in the EEC. British coal is still the cheapest deep-mined coal in Europe, and our production subsidies are still well below those of our competitors. It makes sense for Britain to compete

 It makes sense to pay to provide for a safe and secure supply of energy in the future, of a raw material for our chemical industries and of a substitute and source for oil. Just as it has made sense for successive governments to subsidize our needs for fuel in industry, at — in zero space for example, in home and in the community, but also as a feed stock to provide chemicals and oil. It is a fuel of the present. It is also the fuel for the future.

The trust industry at all the specific is a sero space for example, in computers and in motors. Other export promotion, regional development, and research and development, to protect British agriculture, now running at £2,000m a year.

It makes sense to pay to keep the pits open - and miners at work earning wages and paying taxes rather than paying out social security benefits and losing revenues. And it makes sense too - when millions of our people have to when minious of our people have to live with fuel poverty – for Britain not only to safeguard its energy resources, but also to ensure that fuel is available to our people at es they can afford.

· Labour, therefore, supports the National Union of Mineworkers in integrated energy policy, based on an expanding and healthy coal industry. And we believe that this policy should be based on a new Plan for Coal, to be agreed between the NUM, the Government and the NUM, the Government and the

But we also believe that research' into technologies wich make full use of the potential for coal - such as the liquefaction and gasification of coal, and fluidized bed combustion should be stepped up urgently; and that the potential of combined heat for Coal should provide for coal to take an increased share of the energy market - a market which, under Labour's strategy would be growing alongside an expanding economy. This is the way forward for the coal industry represents a clear threat to the national interest, so too, does the methods chosen by the Tories to deal with the coal dispute. The Tories have deliberately chosen the path of confrontation: deliberately chosen a path leading to grave infringements in the civil rights of private citizens, including miners and their families. The Tories threaten the civil liberties of us all.

Onus on Tories for violence

Il There can be no doubt that the attitudes of this Government, and its desire for confrontation, have helped to inflame and embitter relationships in the coal fields. As a meats in the dispute which are deeply disturbing - a degree of violence quite unusual in British industrial disputes. The Labour Party, therefore, wishes to place firmly on record its condemnation of all forms of violence in industrial disputes - whether it comes from a handful of pickets or from the 12 In our view the major responsibility for the violence lies with the Government. For they are using the police more as a means of implementing their policy on pit closures than in order to uphold the road blocks. This has involved a huge extension of Common Law powers - to prevent an unspecified breach of the peace at some unknown time, at some unknown place. And it has affected not only pickets: other people have been prevented from going to court, calling at their union headquarters, visiting their relations or even

The police have actively attempted to help the NCB by preventing picketing. They have arrested pickets on picket lines on comparalively minor offences, using ancient laws ("Watching and bestung") or because of cries of "scab" (insulting language); used bail conditions to help keep pickets away, some even from addressing meetings; and shown more interest to have pickets shown more interest to have peaces than bound over to keep the peace than pursuing charges to conviction. Three-quarters of all the charges have involved obstruction; only a tenth have been connected with violence and assault.

People collecting money and food for the miners have been harassed and arrested. Collections have been confiscated. Food deliveries have

Police anti-riot tactics have intensified the violence. Police in riot gear, charging police horses, dogs set loose, truncheons drawn - all have been seen on the picket lines. And the decision to keep the gates of the mines open "at all costs", taken as much by the Government as by police officers, has been a major factor in this.

Such developments do not auger well for future relations between police and public. Yet, when the dispute does end, police and public will have to live together in the mining communities and elsewhere. It is all the more important therefore, that the police draw back and reconsider their methods of operating that they refuse to allow themselves to be used by the Tories to help implement the pit closures.

14 The dispute in the coal industry has made more clear than ever the asymptotic in the coal industry that made more clear than ever the posed by this Government to the well being of the British people. Not content with throwing millions of people out of work, with bringing about the worst alump seen in Britain since the Thirties, with destroying their innocence. They also objected to the trial being held destroying their expressions of our in camera with the defendants destroying huge sections of our maanufacturing industry, the Tories, by seeking to cripple our coal industry, are now planning to providing jobs for our people in the future. What is more, in the process of doing so they are clearly prepared subjected anyone to injustice or to challenge - and even destroy - oppression for opposing him or many of the fundamental rights and his Government.

iberties of the British people. 15 The Labour Paraty will resist, with all its strength, these Tory threats. We will continue to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the miners in their struggle to save the mining industry on behalf of the miners themselves and of their families, on behalf of all those in industry at home and in the country who depend on coal on behalf of size of the new House of the British people, their jobs and their future prosperity."

New controversy after ban is lifted

Rebel priest visits Durban six

From Michael Horasby

Dr Beyers Naude, the rebel Afrikaner priest whose seven-year-old "banning order" was unexpectedly lifted on Wednes-day, celebrated his first day of freedom by flying last night to Durban to visit the six political fugitives in the British Consulate.

The invitation to make the dramatic trip came from the Natal Indian Congress, five of whose leaders are in the consulate. Dr Naudé was due to speak later at several prayer meetings in Durban in support of the six. Under the ban he would have been barred from such gatherings.

A spokesman for the six said yesterday the consulate staff's previously cool attitude towards hem had become markedly more friendly since South Africa's refusal to return four of its citizens for trial in Britain on arms smuggling charges.

MEPs meet their Waterloo

Off the rails on the Labour express

The second battle of Waterloo is being waged around Brussels. It comes as the climax to a long and productive anti-EEC campaign mounted within the European Parliament by the British Labour group and financed out of EEC funds.

The opening salvo came in the form of a telexed release from the socialist group press office here to newspapers and radio stations in Britain. "Enro-MPs want to rename London's Waterloo station", it said. By the time Eurocrats started denying it, a new EEC myth had been added to the growing book of Community legends.

It began in a committee meeting of MEPs discussing the old idea for writing a common European history which would play down the arguments of the past. West German members are particularly enthusiastic. M Denis Baudouin, former spokes-man to President Pompidou, ridiculed it. You could never stop an Englishman calling his station Waterloo or a Frenchman calling his Austerlitz, he said. Europe had been made of terrible conflicts and by tearing itself apart through the centuries. For the anti-EEC Labour MEPs on the committee, the mere mention of Waterloo station was enough. "The committee lives in cloud-cuckoo land", Mr Hugh McMahon from Strathclyde est said: The telexed story cleverly gave the impression that the 24 members of the committee were pushing for a name change. The author was the Labour Party's press officer here, Mr Tony

West Germany will pay some DM5,820m (£1,493m) as its share of the DM22,000m programme to improve air bases, ports, fuel pipelines, equipment and munitions

The German contribution, accounting for 26.5 per cent, is some DM1,000m more than Bonn was originally prepared to pay. But after hard talks between German and American defence officials the United States has dropped additional claims for a $200m special shelter progammme and a midterm review after two years which would have involved a 10 per cent rise in the still open yearly instalments. The agree-ment now reached includes a review after three years without virtually any automatic rise.

Magical creation of period

The Bostonians (PG) Curzon

The Bounty (15) ABC Shaftesbury Avenue

Forever Young (15) Classics Haymarket. Oxford Street, Chelsea

The peripatetic production team of James Ivory (director), Ismail Merchant (producer) and Ruth Prawer Jhabvala (writer) have returned to America and Henry James, five years after their adaptation of The Europeans. The Bostonians is more challenging, if only because it sets out to present a much broader panorama of late nineteenth-century society, The strange private contest, between a man and a woman of contrasted personality and belief for the possession of a young girl, is set against the background of the militant, emerging Women's Movement in America, 1876.

The film-makers have not played to the sensibilities of modern audiences by modifying James's mistrust of much of the emancipation effort. His young heroine Verena Tarrant thrills the ladies of Boston with inspired, inspirational orations performed under the sinister influence of her father, a spiritualist and charlatan. Her fanatical and possessive patron. Miss Chancellor. hysterically makes her promise, to prove her dedication to the cause, never to marry. Verena, however, is finally unable to resist the dictates of her heart and the attractions of Basil Ransome a personable if impecuni-ous New York lawyer and Miss

The strength of the adaptation is in not looking for some filmic equiva-lent of James's stylistic elaborations (which would be a fairly fruitless undertaking anyway) but more simply to make concrete the world the book describes. James Ivory's costume films have always shown a special skill for finding and using locations: here he has discovered a nineteenth-century Boston and Cape Cod whose authenticity we never doubt, whether it is the streets, the location hells the interiors which and lecture halls, the interiors - rich and cluttered or bare and shabby. Walter Lassally's photography even manages to give a sense of period to an empty seashore filmed near Martha's Vineyard.

The skill at period extends to the casting. Utterly at ease in the costumes and the milieu, his people are believable realizations of the characters lames described. Linda Hunt (the Oscar-winning small person from The Year of Living person from The Year of Living Dangerously) is a forbiddingly rational Dr Prance, Jessica Tandy a sweetly tough Miss Birdseye, and Wesley Addy a wonderfully sinister Dr Tarrant. Of the principals, Christopher Reeve permits glimpses of the ruthlessness behind Basil's charm, though Vanessa Redgrave is a rather monotonously grim and hysterical Miss Chancellor. The real discovery of the film however is discovery of the film, however, is Madeleine Potter, who skilfully sustains the mystery of the exact demarcation of naivety and cunning

The Bounty arrives with the undeserved reputation of being the real story of the historical event which has already inspired two pictures - the Laughton-Gable version of Mutiny on the Bounty directed by Frank Lloyd in 1935 and the Trevor Howard-Marion Brando remake by Lewis Milestone of 1962. Readers of Glyn Christian's Fragile Paradise - the latest of thousands of accounts of the affair, but the bestresearched portrait of Fletcher Christian - will recognize departures from history which sometimes seem

حكدًا من الأعل

The central conflict of the Bounty story must essentially be (as, historically, no doubt it was) the conflict of two proud, ambitious young men at first linked and then divided by passionate feeling. In this interpretation it often seems that the effort has been less to make Bligh sympathetic than to made Christian unsympathetic. Exposed to the fleshly delights of Tahiti, Christian becomes such a weak, hedonistic slob that it would be hard not to sympatize with Bligh's exasperation. On the other hand there is nothing to reveal what quality in Bligh's personality it was that made him, even though he was a fine sailor and no worse disciplinarian than many of his naval contemporaries, repeatedly inspire mutinies throughout his

Neither character is ever strongly enough defined to provide genuine conflict; and the fault lies more in the writing than in the conscientious performances of Anthony Hopkins and Mel Gibson (flashing his boyish charm a bit too much). The script is singly credited to Robert Bolt, but it is apparent that other and less talented hands have made their contribution. It is hard to recognize Bolt's style in banal expository scenes that evoke memories of historical plays on Children's Hour, or to suppose that he could not have found a better solution to the difficulties of dramatic structure (the big action scene is over and done with when the story is only two-thirds through) than the dull framing device of Bligh's court martial.

The troubles no doubt rise from the film's complicated history. It was initially to have been made by David Lean as two full-length films. Lean departed the project, but the producer Dino de Laurentiis was committed to the extent of a million-dollar replica of the Bounty (steel, clad in wood) which had been prepared for it. Discovery of naivety and cunning: Madeleine Potter with Christopher Reeve in The Bostonians appear to have been amalgamated; and the project was taken over by the young New Zealander Roger Donaldon, whose talents as action director had been previously demonstrated in more modest films, Sleeping Dogs and Smash Palace. Donaldson stages a lively mutiny, but afterwards fails to convey a real sense either of the privations or the maritime genius of Bligh's 4,000-mile voyage, so that it follows as an anti-climax.

The publicity for Forever Young is in two minds about whether or not the film belongs to the "First Love" series from the same stable, David Puttnam's Enigma Films. One can see the difficulty. On the surface this is the same world as P'Tang, Yang, Kipper Bang or Those Glory, Glory Days, the same potent mixture of comfortable suburbia, schooldays, nostalgia, music, the pleasures and traumas of adolescence. Yet there is a much darker, stranger quality in the relationships developed in Ray Connolly's script which makes David Drury's first feature considerably more sinewy than its companion

It centres on a boyhood friendship created out of passion for rock and roll. The two friends meet again 25 years on, when one is a celibate

Catholic priest and the other a teacher with a failed marriage behind him. Initially affectionate, their reunion revives bitter memories of old jealousies and betrayals, secret sexual yearnings. The innocent victims of their anger are a young boy, with a passionate fixation on the priest, and his mother. The very ordinariness of the setting highlights tortuous emotional entanglements; and the performances, especially of the young actors Jason Carter, Julian Firth and the 14-year-old Liam Holt, are delicately managed.

Concert CBSO/Rattle Festival Hall

It was clearly an act of homage when in 1937 Schoenberg orchestrated one of Brahms's early but great chamber works, the G minor Piano Quartet, thus turning it into the symphony it could so easily have first been. And yet, hearing the fruits of Schoenberg's labours played on Wednesday by the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, one could not help wondering if perhaps the ven-ture rather distorted the balance of the original.

The problem lies in the finale. In Brahms's unaltered version it seems quite natural that the serious atmosphere of such a vast work should be dissipated in part by a relatively carefree but nevertheless taste-ful gipsy rondo finale. The process only recalls Haydn, after all. But Schoenberg, through his colourful, su-premely skilful orchestration, success in turning the move-ment into a kind of obligatory encore whose humour verges on the camp, particularly when the xylophone makes its spectacular appearance. Whoever said that Schoenberg was dull?

The critical amount of musical weight thus removed seems to have been placed instead on the penultimate movement, an Andante con moto whose Beethovenian substance was turned by the ripeness of Schoenberg's instrumentation into the work's eloquent climax and, to all intents and purposes, its end.

if Schoenberg's job here was almost too well done, the first two movements retained the elegance of the original, but gained cogency from Schoenberg's larger palette of sound. The first movement, with woodwinds doubling each other at the octave, provided an immediate reminder that this is no pastiche of Brahms's own orchestral technique but rather a view from a later, grateful age. And the second, which appar-ently signified Brahms's first use of the Intermezzo in place of the more aggressive Scherzo of his Germanic forebears and contemporaries, remained beautifully transparent. Simon Rattle's direction, and the CBSO's playing, were at all times assured.

It was a curious idea to uxtapose this work with Rachmaninov's Second Piano Concerto, in which the soloist was Cecile Ousset. Opinion of her playing seems divided, but I can only say that while she certainly possesses strength and a formidable technique I found there to be no depth to her reading. The first movement had none of the darkness that it ought to have and the more lyrical passages were self-consciously rather than naturally moulded. Very professional, but very disquiet-

For those who never heard it, the full name of the programm was Mardi Gras; A carnival of the best in popular music and all that jazz. At 10pm every Sunday for 10 years, after the news and the ads, came a frenetic scratchy old version of "Tiger Rag", fading away to be replaced by Brian Rust's voice.

No pseudo-American is Rust, no smoothy DJ, but a real person with an eager, slightly scruffy, vaguely regional voice talking as fast as he could.
And what records! All 78s from his own collection, mostly from the 1920s and 1930s. A lot were straight jazz, though some leant sideways into dance music, some sported vocalists, a few came from films and one every six months was a tango record from Buenos Aires.

I used to pride myself on a useful knowledge of jazz history until I started listening to Brian Rust; not only had I never heard most of the records, I had never heard of the bands. If there was an unknown orchestra playing in a hotel in San Antonio in 1927 or a gettogether of Benny Goodman and the boys in 1935 that nobody else knew about, Brian Rust was sure to know. Sometimes he knew, but didn't have a copy. Then he would get a copy. Occasionally it would take a long time several requests he played two or three years after receiving them, because it took him that long to find a copy of the

SHOULDN'T YOU HAVE BRAKES

Just when you need them most, conventional thakes can be their least effective.

Take the situation above.

Slam on the brakes in an ordinary car and the left hand wheels could lock, making the car spin uncontrollably.

The BMW copes so serenely in conditions like this because it's fitted with a braking system which prevents the wheels from locking in the first place.

However hard you hit the brakes.

Logically enough it's called the Anti-lock Braking System (or ABS for brevity's sake).
In effect it performs the human action of pumping the brakes. That's a way of preventing a skid that every racing driver is familiar with.

But ABS does it up to 10 times a second. Far quicker than the most agile driver.

On each brake disc a computer controlled sensor monitors the speed of the wheel. And, when it's about to lock, the brake pressure is eased for an instant.

It works for each wheel independently. So each brake acts according to the road surface beneath it. Not according to what the other three are doing.

The results are undeniably impressive.
On wet or icy roads ABS reduces stopping distance by up to 40%.

In more graphic terms, at 70mph that amounts to the width of a football pitch.

ABS also allows you to commit one of motor-ings cardinal sins. That is, steer and brakesimultaneously.

An advantage that wasn't lost on a journalist from 'Fast Lane':

"I've slammed the brakes on while cornering at speed on a wet, greasy road ... the car simply carried on round the corner, slowing dramatically as it did."

In short, it means that you're in control of all 5 wheels all of the time.

While most manufacturers don't give you the option at all, ABS is now available on all 6 cylinder BMWs.

Of course, the old maxim still applies: Any car is only as safe as its driver.

THE ULTIMATE DRIVING MACHINE

But it's good to know that, in an emergency, a BMW's brakes will calmly think for themselves.

Dear travel agent, please stop the cows staring at me.

For the next few weeks, tour operators will be sorting through the annual deluge of complaints. In a year which saw the recurrence of large scale hotel overbooking and a spale of violent muggings in Spain including the murder on the Costa Brava of Scottish holiday maker David Mathieson -/one might have expected these issues to have formed the core of most complaints. Not a bit of it, says Ron Wheal head of customer relations for Thomson Holidays, Britain's biggest holiday company which took more than a million abroad this summer, "Holidaymakers are complaining about petty, silly little things." Such as? "The fact that their botel is next to a road. How do they get to their hotel if it's not next to a road?" But the greatest trouble for Thomson clients this year, it seems, has been the behaviour of fellow holidaymakers - and rowdy British youths have been disturbing the peace all over Spain this summer from Benidorm to Ibiza,

Mr Wheal said if someone really wanted action over a spoilt holiday, "they should try to sort it out with a holiday company representative there

Perhaps one of the most common grievances is that the holiday fails to live up to the brochure promises. A family from Berkshire with two young children were attracted by a two-week package in a three star hotel that was described as "friendly", and "particularly suitable for families with children". It offered "cots, baby minding high chairs and early suppers. When they arrived the hotel was not up to three rude and the promised facilities for children practically nonexistent

The Which? Personal Service, which subsequently took up the claim, maintained that not only were the expressed terms (those spelt out in the brochure) not met, but an implied, unwritten term, present in all holiday contracts, that the accommodation will be "reasonable" was not fulfilled either. An initial complaint sent to the holiday company by the family was

With her unmistakable pout and jutting breasts, she looks down on many a dull town hall meeting, immortalized as Marianne, the emblem of post-revolutionary France

Brigine Bardot was more than just a poddess. For a war-weary generation, she came to personify a new, liberated, sun-soaked, care-free France. The powers that be accepted that, and gave their permission for her to be used as the model for a new Marianne.

Today she is 50, and from a distance looks pretty much the same as she did 30 years ago - the same mane of long blonde hair (dyed, as she is a brunette). the same skin-tight jeans and heavily mascarared eyes. She still attracts many an adr iring glance, but no longer sees herself as sex symbol, nor makes any effort to embellish herself. The cosmetic surgery or gruelling aerobic exercises of other aging stars are not for her. She simply wants to be what she is.

Yet she hates growing old. It frightens her. "What does it feel like to be about to be 50?", she was asked in a recent, rare, interview in Paris Match. "It makes me want to puke!" she replied with a laugh.

"It's really difficult growing old. People who say 'It's marvellous to be 50', must be mad! I've got the temperament of a young girl. I dance, I play the guitar, and I feel as if I'm 16, but my face doesn't fit . . . It's not only the end of youth which gets me. It's the beginning of all the problems with one's health - I who have never been ill." And in another ten years? "It will be worse. I'll be 60, and prefer not to think about that,"

. With the exception two years ago of a three-hour television documentary on her life, it's been II years since BB last agreed to make a film. Since then she has lived more or less as a recluse in her house at St Tropez, on the French Riviera, devoting her life to the defence of animals. Yet the legend lives on.

In a recent poll, where people were asked which women they thought had done most for the image of France, Brigitte Bardot was placed second overall, after Mme Simone Veil, and was actually the first choice of young people in the 18-24 age group. Yet she was never considered a good actress, and her private life was frankly a mess, as she herself admits.

It was what she represented that was important. She did for France what the Beatles did for Britain, only she started carlier. She was 14 when her picture first appeared on the cover of Elle magazine. That was in 1948. It was still only 1952 when she married her first husband, Roger Vadim, who was to turn her into a world-famous star with his film And God Created Woman in

Her era of glory coincided with a re-discovered sense of national greatness and optimism under De Gaulle, before the "events" of May 1968 and the economic recession of the 1970s. She was adored, and detested, and plagued by Paparazzi. One British journalist wrote at the time: "BB is the greatest shock suffered by the French since the 1789 revolution.

What is life like at 50 for such an idol? She has no regrets about the passing of her stardom. She now hates the vanities and the vulgarities of the Hollywood world. She claims that she is happier than she was, because she has now finally got what she wants: peace. But she is still subject to terrible depressions, and rumours of another possible suicide attempt were rife last year when she mysteriously cancelled her 49th birthday celebrations at the last minute, and later turned up in

In the interview with Paris Match. she says that she sometimes feels she just has not got the strength to go on.
Sometimes I find myself crying alone in bed at night. A hundred fantastic letters cannot replace the arms of a man who holds you tight and says: 'Go on, Brighte!' I need warmth and physical encouragement as well, it's difficult, I cry all day...it happens quite often, and then I pick myself up again...

"I have been very happy, very rich, very beautiful, much adulated, very famous, and very unhappy. I've been let down too often. I've had really terrible disappointments in my life. That is why I've chosen to withdraw, to live alone ... I sometimes dream about another great love affair, but such things don't happen to me any more. I don't expect anything, otherwise I'll only be disappointed again ...

"Men are more concerned with other things now than their feelings for a woman. They no longer want to be responsible for someone, but when two people live together, they must be responsible for the person they live with. Women have wanted too much to rid themselves of men. Long live Women's Lib! Now, they are alone . . .

"A woman is made to make the life of a man happy, not to work all day and then make hasty deep frozen meals in the evening before settling down in front of the television. A woman is made to arrange vases of flowers, to prepare good-smelling soups, and to create a beautiful home. Work, OK, but not at any price. Money and the television are the two great scourges of modern society. No one talks to one another any more."

In that interview, Brigitte Bardot explains that she has turned to animals because of her disillusionment with life and men. But in another less gloomy article on Bardot, published in Paris Match earlier this month, Roger Vadim reports a recent conversation with his ex-wife in which she talks about what Vadim refers to as, "the man she shares her life with and has known for several years," of whom she reportedly says: "I get on better and better with him. There is a kind of gentleness I've never known

Brigitte Bardot's campaign in defence of animals is not just a dilettante escapism. It is more even than a vocation, she says it is a passion, based on a life-long love of animals. When she first began filming, it was always her ambition to earn enough money so as to be able to buy a farm where no animal was killed, she says,

'I've been very rich, very beautiful, much adulated, very famous ... and very unhappy

A vegetarian, she now lives with 60 cats and 11 dogs, most of them abandoned strays which she has taken in; a goat bought from a market where they were being sold strung up by their hind legs; and a foal saved from the slaughter house. The local children call her the "Animal Fairy." But, she says with a rucful smile, she has no magic wand, and therefore has to depend on sheer hard work, badgering ministers, writing thousands of letters, taking part in demonstrations.

President Mitterrand recently wrote to congratulate her on her activities in defence of animals and to invite her to come and see him. She plans to use the occasion to ask him to set up a ministry for animal's rights.

"There's one for women, and the need it much less than animals," she says, adding: "If I could ever say one day that my life has not been entirely useless, it would be thanks to my defence of animals.

Was Wedgie laced?

Was Tony Benn's mysterious illness midway through Labour's bitter deputy leadership campaign of 1981 the result of an attempt on his life? It is a "very real possibility", claims Sydney Higgins in a new book, The Benn Inheritance, and he writes that "that certainly was the view of one of the doctors who treated him" at Charing Cross Hospital. The announced diagnosis was Guillain-Barre Syndrome, he continues, "the effects of which are shared by chronic mercury and arsenic poisoning". At yesterday's launch of the book Higgins refused to identify the doctor involved but said he had seen his written testimony, Benn, sitting heside him, was more circumspect. He had never pursued the matter, he said. The police had never investigated it because he had never reported it, and he didn't think there was anything in it, "If they want to get rid of me they'll get rid of me through British Rail sandwiches," he said, brushing off further questions,

Over and out

The Daily Mirror's political editor of Il years, Terence Lancaster, resigned yesterday - just days before the start of Labour's Blackpool conference. Mirror sources say he refused to be "humiliated" by the changes in editorial policy since Robert Maxwell bought the Mirror group two months ago. Yesterday the Mirror's editor Mike Molloy said Lancaster had ouit due to "very had arthritis." though the paper's political veteran has lived and worked with it for more than 10 years. Lancaster's colleagues say the arthritis is merely a pretext - "He simply didn't like the regime", said one. Lancaster's is the second editorial resignation since Maxwell's arrival; the first was editorial director Tony Miles. Lancaster's successor will be Joe Haines. Harold Wilson's former press secretary, who is now assistant editor.

He is now serving his seven-year sentence in Albany, prison, Isle of Wight. The union is paying £250.

Brian Bateson, the pilot who trails such banners as "Kremlin Sends Congratulations" over Greenham Common protesters and "Scargill Get Stuffed" over the TUC in Brighton, had no plans to fly any political message along Blackpool's scafront during Labour's conference next week. Not, that is, until he learnt that the local trades council had written to Lancashire's chief constable asking that Bateson be grounded to avoid any breach of the peace. Bateson, suitably riled, is now seeking a particularly provocative message to trail behind his plane. BARRY FANTONI and Militant Tendency is just one of the uncomfortable ironies of the black sections campaign which will surface again at next week's Labour Party conference in Blackpool.

Mr Russell Profitt, a former Labour parliamentary candidate and

'Britain's black community - in

The ailiance between Mr Kinnock

Militant supporters have done, that the black sections campaign has been created as a vehicle to "provide positions or possibly parliamentary careers for a handful of middle-class The fact remains, however, that black voters predominantly support the Labour Party. A survey carried out by the Commission for Racial Equality during the 1979 general election found that, in 24 areas, 90 per cent of Afro-Caribbean and 86 per cent of Asian voters backed Labour, compared with only 50 per cent of whites.

A similar survey for last year's general election found that black support for Labour had fallen by 4 per cent. Asian support by 6 per cent and white support by 7 per cent.

Yet in spite of this tenacious loyalty, there is not one black MP, not one black MEP, not even one black member of Labour's NEC, Hugh Roberts, a member of the Norwich party and lecturer in politics at the University of East Anglia, says in a tract published this week: "This is not because they are victims of a systematic prejudice ... but because they are newcomers to South under boundary changes, the new Battersea constituency party anywhere, it unavoidably takes time for them to find their feet and make their mark".

> Vauxhall Labour Party, which has already recognized its own black section in defiance of instructions from party headquarters, says in another pamphlet published this week. "We recognize that the Labour Party itself perpetuates racism. It is an institution rooted in a racist society and its own routine practices, customs and form of organization exclude black people from the structures of power as effectively as if they were barred from membership."

The black section campaigners want black representation on constituency general committees and executive committees, and it has also been suggested that places should be reserved for blacks on council and parliamentary candidate shortlists, as well as an allocation of seats on the national executive.

Mr Kinnock says that such a move would be segregationist, would lead to bitter argument over the definition of black, and that the existence of women's sections within the party has not resulted in a proportionate increase in the number of women candidates, councillors or MPs.

Militant's Young Socialists pursue the pure line of their tendency: "The task of the Labour Party is to unite workers, not divide them. Labour must counterpose the divisions fostered by capitalism - on the grounds of sex, craft, religion, race with maximum unity.

The issue may well be forced to a conference vote in Blackpool next Wednesday, because black section campaigners are becoming impanient. Last year's conference stalled on a decision while the national executive considered the problem. Next week, the executive will ask the conference to stall for another year for further consultation, consideration and the "hope" of conclusions.

Meanwhile, the raw politics of the debate is becoming more excited and, possibly, more honest. It is now being said by Labour establishment sources that if black sections were created they would soon become the political creature of the left; Mr Senn and Mr Livingstone have already given their blessing.

But the potential for Labour embarrassment might well make black sections inevitable. If Labour's blacks continually charge their own leadership with racist oppression then that could have its own impact on the black vote. There is a possibility of a black boycott.

Mr Profitt said this week: "Unless real changes are made before the next general election, abstentions could be the order of the day in the 40 or so key marginals where the black vote could make a significant difference, and thus deny Labour the

John Carlin sets the scene for Howe's Central America visit

How Duarte has failed to deliver

The foreign ministers of 12 Western European nations arrive in Costa Rica today to get acquainted with a region considered by President Reagan to be a strategically crucial "backyard" and whose destiny, accordingly. America must set out to control.

Central America's tiniest nation, El Salvador, is also the most politically prized. It is where the whole region's battle between left and right. East and West is being fought most fiercely. The rebel Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMLN), which receives Soviet-bloc backing, and govern-ment troops, financed, trained and almost fully dependent on the US, are in the fifth year of a seemingly endless civil war.

According to President Reagan, if El Salvador falls to the left then Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica and possibly even Mexico will follow. It has therefore become the testing ground for a Reagan policy aimed at maintaining the United States geopolitical grip on Central America. At loggerheads with these goals at times is the Contadora Group. The group was formed in January 1983 by four Latin American countries bent on finding a political solution to a crisis which they believe has its root in centuries of social injustice. Just over a year ago the presidents of the Contadora four. - Mexico, Colombia, Venezuela and Panama drew up a document of objectives for Central America, putting a build-up, and an end to foreign military intervention, as indispensable conditions for a political settlement. Now Sir Geoffrey Howe and his colleagues from the EEC are to meet the five Central American and four Contadora foreign ministers for two days of talks. Their most obvious shared concern is to defuse a potential escalation of the global East-West conflict.

It will be a priority of this unprecedented meeting to bolster the Contadora peace initiative, generally held to be worthy in its intentions but bereft of political muscle. El Salvador's president, José Napoleon Duarte, had repeatedly pronounced his commitment to the Contadora process. Yet his most farreaching act since coming to power on June 1 has been to persuade a habitually sceptical American Congress to approve an additional $70m in additional military aid to the Salvadorean armed forces. Buoyed up by all this American money, the government's war effort is escalating. There are few signs of any imaginative alternative approaches to ending the misery of a country where 50,000 people have died violent deaths in the last five years and one million people, a fifth of the total population, have been driven out of their homes. President Duarte's first four months in office have been a lesson in public

Organized labour, the key to JUARTE'S ELECTION VICTORY ON MAY 6 is growing restless while the Roman Catholic Church, eager at first to draw encouragement from the electoral defeat of the extreme right, is now saying peace looks further away than ever. "The war continues to be the daily bread of the Salvadorean people", said one of this month's editions of the Church's weekly newsletter. Since the May election President Duarte has visited the United States twice, and has been to Britain, France, West Germany and other European countries. He has just returned from a South American tour. Avuncular, earnest, passionate, as the occasion demands. Duarte meets heads of government, speaks before the US Congress and appears on television chat shows. Back home, eager to mollify his tra-ditional opponents - the armed forces and the private sector - he assiduously pays courtesy calls on his army colonels, and opens his doors to the business community.

So far Duarte's energetic selfpromotion abroad has netted him the $70m from the US, $18m from West Germany and, symbolically important at least, £100,000 from Britain. This last prompted the rebel FMLN radio station to launch an unusual verbal foray across the Atlantic, calling "the arch-reactionary prime minister of England" a "racist, warmongering violator of international law".

Shortly after this was announced the Carinthian Homeland Front, an extreme pan-German organization which makes no secret of its determination to stamp out bilingual teaching so that "German children can be taught by German his power", explains a high government official; "He is trying to draw the poison out of the military and the private sector." "No, he's not consolidating, he's not strengthening his power", counters a university academic, "his aim is merely to remain as head of the government."

Duarte is aware that US money offers him his best defence for fending off any attempts to overthrow him and, accordingly, has accommodated himself to Washing-ton's wishes. "The US ambassador has Duarte under his thumb", says businessman Mario Valiente, a leading organizer of Major Roberto d'Aubuisson's extreme-right Repub-lican Nationalist Alliance (Arena) party. "The American embassy here is like a bank that's intervened in a company to which it has lent a lot of money. The company has gone under and the bank has had to take

Before the election Duarte's rhetoric highlighted social injustice and a tradition of government repression as the understandable causes, as he put it, of the FMLN's revolution. Now he has changed his emphasis, talking in the manner of US State Department, of the FMLN as "an invading army", another manifestation of "the international red peril" he referred to in Venezuela last week.

With the arrival of more American helicopters and armaments, army operations have intensified in weeks. The net result has tended to increase the number -abready half a million - of El Salvador's internal refugees. The pattern of all army operations is for the bulk of FMLN forces to vanish into the mountains while a small rearguard pins down government troops, resulting in many more soldier than guerrilla victims.

The balance of military power is clearly as stalemated as ever. American plans to reduce the FMLN to a residual insurgency easily contained, looks a distan goal, as army commanders in the

The Popular Democratic Union (UPD), a centrist labour organiza-tion financed in large part by the US with some 400,000 members, gave its full support to Duarte during the electoral campaign. Now UPD has put out an unusually rebellious statement, "demanding" a ceasefire in the war (as the FMLN has proposed to Duarte) and insisting on dialogue as the only way to rebuild a crippled economy and solve El Salvador's terrible social problems. Miss Hernandez of the Catholic Church Human Rights Office chooses to find hope in the Costa Rica meeting, seeing in it a means to arrest this dismal drift. "The Europeans", she says, "have a great responsibility... they have a moral duty to put pressure on the United States and President Duarte to find a political solution that will stop the killing of the Salvadorean people."

The European foreign ministers

will come to judge, too, whether they have a duty to their own countries in avoiding the prolongation of the conflict in El Salvador. ## Blotting out some nuclear facts fashionable phrase in the disarmament debate this year and the screening of The Eighth Day on television the other night has put it on the wider political map.

Having been one of the first people to write about this issue in this country and to proclaim its importance, I can honestly say that all this discussion is very welcome. On the other hand, as usual with a new idea, the whole thing has been accepted with wildly uncritical enthusiasm by a lot of people who ought to know better.

It is crucial to be clear that the scientists are still putting forward a chain of unproved hypotheses, every link of which is speculative and which only several years of painstaking research will verify or discard. Everyone now knows the supposed-conclusion of this chain, namely that in the aftermath of a large-scale nuclear war the smoke and soot thrown up into the atmosphere by burning cities would create a sunproof blanket over the nouthern hemisphere, causing temperatures to drop to sub-freezing levels for many months, photosynthesis to cease and darkness and famine to stalk every nation.

Very few people seem to recognize the complexity of the preconditions necessary to produce this state of

• The nuclear exchange must be large enough to produce at least 1,000 huge conflagrations in built-up areas. This requirement depends, in turn, on the targeting strategies of the superpowers as well as on the weather at the time of the attacks both very variable factors.

• The fires, once started, must generate a very large quantity of soot particles, it has been assumed that 10 to the power of 14 grams of small black particles would be produced by fires on the scale supposed; but it is not proved and to any case. calculations are made difficult because fire conditions would vary

· Very considerable amounts of this soot would have to reach high altitudes, for if it did not, rain and wind would soon disperse it. Forest fires, which produce about a third as much smoke in a year as the nuclear war is supposed to create, do not usually inject it into high altitudes. Big city fires might well be different, but just how different nobody knows.

 If the smoke did get to high altitudes, it is not at all certain how it would spread. Assumptions have been made on the basis of what we know about high altitude winds, but it is probable that the presence of the particles on a big scale would cause changes in the wind patterns. What these changes might be, is still not well understood It is certainly possible that all these assumptions will turn out according to present theories.

Research should clear up many uncertainties, though it will never remove them entirely. Meanwhile it is irresponsible to raise people's hopes on rickety foundations.

"hopes" because, I say everyone has realized, the whole thesis, if true, appears to make nuclear weapons unusable. We do not have to worry about Star Wars and other elaborate ways of defending ourselves. If the attacker knows. that his attack will eventually envelop his own country in a huclest winter whether his opponent retaliates or not, he will never press, the button. 🛴

Moreover this argument is even stronger than it looks at first sight, because it is not necessary for the nuclear winter thesis to be absolutely certain in order for it to have its effect. As in the case of nuclear deterrence itself, it is enough that decision-makers should believe that there is a reasonable probability that something unpleasant will happen, for then they will not take the risk. But here too, great caution is necessary. The more one thinks about it, the more one sees that the nuclear winter hypothesis is not necessarily the answer to the nuclear disarmer's prayer, In the first place. it does not do away with the necessity of possessing nuclear arms of some kind, so long as one's opponent possesses them. This can casily be seen if you imagine a situation in which the Soviet Union has one deliverable hydrogen bomb and the West has none. The Russians then have the capacity to blow up New York, and because the consequences of such an act would be far below the nuclear winter threshold, the threat would be real

By the same token, nuclear winter does not affect the Gaddafi, Galtieri, Gandhi problem, for all the Third World countries who possess or are working to possess nuclear weapons know that the scale of their nuclear operations will remain irrelevant to the actual fate of the planet for many

(All one can say on this point is theory, if that the nuclear winter theory, if proved, would make unnecessary vast arsenals of nuclear weapons and that if, as scientists hypothesize, 100-inegatons of nuclear explosion would produce this calamity, the most that either superpower would need to hold would be 50 megatons minus one. Beneath the 100 megaton level parity would be required in order to prevent one's opponent being able to let off more bombs on one's territory than one could on his, before bringing on the nuclear winter.

An important aspect of this point is that it allows tactical or battlefield nuclear weapons a role, and therefore leaves many of the familiar arguments about escalation and "no first use" virtually untouched. Nato can still invest in nuclear artillery in order to avoid the cost of conventipnal forces, knowing that a limited nuclear war in Europe would not have wintry consequences. If such a wah escalated to intermediate-range missiles the threshold might be crossed - and in the confusion of an escalating nuclear exchange, that danger would be very high. But this consideration might not be enoughto prevent either side taking the first step of the escalation ladder - a step which in itself, would be far short of the global catastrophe of The Eighth

It follows from this that the point made by George Walden in the programme - that nuclear-free zones do not make much sense in the nuclear winter context -- is wrong. Efforts to eliminate tactical nuclear weapons in Central Europe would still be relevant. On the other hand the Labour Party should be aware that this same context makes it more certain than ever before that neutralism would be no guarantee of

A one-upman in the soup

OK. Terence: we know, we know. Homo sum: humani nil a me alienum puto. I am; a journo, and therefore I take an interest in everything anybody does. But only up to a certain extent, dear boy. I am afraid that I have no time left to learn Russian so as to be able to read Dostoevsky in the original; still less time to learn Old Norse so as to read the Edda. I see no necessity to have my palm read, or go to watch ice dancing. If we bring back public hanging, I am not going to watch it, not even to campaign against it as Dickens did in his thunderous letter to The Times after watching the execution of the Mannings: A sight so inconceivably awful as the wickedness and levity of the immense crowd collected at that execution this morning could be imagined by no man, and could be presented in no heathen land under the sun."

Sorry, Terence, but hanging is out. And so, I am afraid, is fashion. Life is simply too short to pay that amount of attention to what one covers one's nakedness with. Fashion writers take an unrealistic view of life. At crack of dawn, with Jamie breaking eggs on to the rings of the cooker, and the beagles defecating on the kitchen floor, there is not time to make a judicious selection of kit and accessories. If one gets a pair of socks that roughly match, and a shirt that is not a collage of yesterday's meals, one is winning. I cannot be bothered to read the rubbish that assumes that we each have a levée and a purse as elaborate as those of the Sun King.

Cooking is out too: not the basic process, but the treatment of cooking as an art form, with a continual neurotic search for new ways of spoiling good food with bad. messes. I enjoy cooking, and have a wide repertoire of recipes, ranging from scrambled eggs and sauce Béarnaise (much the same sort of thing, really) to Chicken Marengo with a soupcon of basil for special occasions. I do not wish to experiment, to exchange recipes, or to read about cooking. The thing to do with food is cook it, eat it, wash up, and shut up about it.

With these robust (or philistine) views on the subject, it came as something of a surprise that for some years I wrote a gourmet wine and food column for the Glasgow Herald. God bless her, and all who write in her. It is the kind of thing that happens in the little disturb-ances of journalism. It seemed unpersuasive to write the pieces under my own name, so I signed them with the pseudonym Erisich-thon, in a spot of classical allusion one-upmanship. You remember the chappy? A Thessalian rough eater. He offended Ceres by chopping down her sacred trees. She cursed him with insatiable hunger. To get money for the groceries, he sold everything, including his daughter, over and over again. Daughter always came home, because she could metapmorphose into any shape, a useful present from her lover, Neptune Eventually Erisichthom became so ravenous that he was driven to autophagy, and fed himself by chomping his own body.

There are references to the greedy old fellow in English literature: in Crashaw's Sospetto d'Herode, and in Phineas Fletcher's Purple Island, his allegorical poem on the human body, which is, no doubt, on all your bedside tables. Erisichthon's gourmet browsing and sluicing column was long on colour writing, but short on consumer; service. I wrote prose poems about the new French wines, or the virtues of strawberries in season, for a city that in those days preferred whisky and pies. I published recipes only when some Glaswegian Mrs Beeton bothered to send one in to me. And I never tried the foul formulae out myself.

One December Erisichthon published with much puffing and falderal a recipe for Cold Duck Soup that somebody had sent me. The ingredients, which make me shudder in retrospect, included Knorr chicken cubes, orange juice, and white wine. A Kelvinside matron wrote in the next week to say she had planned her whole Christmas dinner around this Cold Duck Soup, and I. had ruined her Christmas. It was about then that Erisichthon decided to hang up his skillet and corkscrew. I am a journo: I take an interest in almost everything.

CATCHING THE TIDE

If nothing else, the annual IMF meetings serve as milestones along the passage of world economic history. This year's meetings, just ended in Washington, were clearly intended to mark a transition to phase three of the international debt crisis. The first and second phases were characterized by financial emergency and frantic damage limitation. Now, it is hoped, the world can look forward to the resumption of steady growth in the developing world, of the kind that can float bankers and borrowers alike off the rocks of

Has the tide really turned? In Washington, both the IMF and World Bank were staunchly reporting a remarkable improvement in the performance of both the developed and the developing world. The rich have grown more strongly than expected. The poor have cut their balance of payments deficits faster than anyone forecast. At first, most of the cutback came through lower imports, at some cost to their domestic economies (to say nothing of producers in the industrial world). But this year we have, for the first time since the 1980 recession, a real rise in income per head in the developing world.

The system - depending on IMF adjustment programmes as the key to new money - has, just, held together. Even Argentina has finally signed a memorandum of agreement with the cast recession. The economic IMF, though sceptics doubt it river is still tidal. The business will stick to the programme. To mark what they hope is the debtors' transfer from casualty ward to convalescence, the industrial governments which dominate the IMF bave modestly trimmed its lending limits without causing any confrontation with the developing borrowers? world. Instead, the developing countries have agreed to the summit they have been demanding taking the undramatic form of special meetings of the top committees of the IMF and the World Bank.

International eyesight is being adjusted from the next step to the near horizon. Debt rescheduling is being developed to take care, not just of the coming twelve months, but of the next four or five years. Changes which can only take effect slowly, like a switch to private equity finance from excessive reliance on bank debt, are being urged on developing countries and gradually stimulated. The role of the international institutions themselves is, rightly, being reappraised.

But there has been almost a conspiracy of silence on the dangers ahead. Both the IMF and the World Bank have, indeed, uttered specific warnings; the IMF continues to bleat for convergent economic policies and controlled budgets, plus "structural" adjustment in advanced economies - all of which is impersonal code for a request to the United States to cut its deficit and Europe to improve its labour markets. The World Bank has issued a scarifying report on the intractable disasters of sub-Saharan Africa, where starvation and persistent economic failure are inextricably linked.

But national institutions find it congenitally difficult to forecycle has not, as even Mr Nigel Lawson admits, been abolished. The stronger-than-expected re-covery celebrated by almost every speaker at these meetings may reverse itself next year what then happens to the longterm plans of creditors and

Growth in industrial world leave the world financial system demand is critical to the de- well and truly on the rocks.

veloping world. But President Reagan is only half right in his claim that the developing world has gained more from American growth than it has lost from American interest rates. To claim that higher interest rates have been compensated for by higher export sales is like telling a man not to complain about bigger mortgage payments, since he has been allowed to work overtime to earn the extra money. Provided interest rates fall sharply, and the world growth rate only modestly, the developing countries can maintain and even improve their debt service, and the strains of rescheduling can be eased.

Provided, that is, world mar-kets remain open. Thus the Americans are more than halfright in taking up the cause of a new round of trade negotiations. The European objection, that there is still plenty for existing working parties to do, may be sound - but it ignores the need for a fresh impetus to the struggle against protectionism.

Such an impetus is needed, in America, in Europe, in the developing world itself. Resche-duled debts still have to be serviced - it is pointless shovelling new loans into countries which cannot earn the interest costs. There is a real danger of commercial bankers congratulating themselves on translating one impossible loan book into another. This danger is accentuated by the risks of a more serious recession. If interest rates prove sticky while growth slows if unemployment in the indus-trial world begins to accelerate at just the moment when the major debtor countries reach a new peak in their rescheduling needs - then the ebb economic tide. which was successfully nego-tiated in the early 1980s, will

The exemption goes back to 1913 when government began to fashion protective and the cathedrals advisory controls for ancient monuments. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Randall Davidson, pleaded that the Church of England be exempt from secular control over any of its buildings used for worship and pledged the church to look after them itself and improve its arrangements for The exemption lasted through later legislation. It does not apply to ordinary town and country planning controls (new building, extensions, alterations of appearance), but it does apply to the special controls for buildings of high architectural quality or historical interest. Churches are listed - 20,000 of them - but so long as they are in use as churches they escape the controls that normally follow from listing.

Virtually all the ecclesiastical buildings that the 1913 legislation would have covered at the time belonged to the Church of England. Extensive listing, the passage of time and changes in taste have brought many dissenting churches and chapels into the net. It has been thought proper to put other churches on the same footing as the Church of England in this respect, although none of them has comparable formal procedures for vetting

That is now part of the problem; and the problem has come to the surface because the inclusion since 1977 of churches in use in the distribution of public funds for the restoration of historic buildings (£20 million so far) alters the basis on which the ecclesiastical exemption was originally granted; and because public opinion has become increasingly sensitive to breakages in the "heritage" china shop. The Department of the Environment accordingly issued a consultation paper earlier this year inviting comments on the question of change versus the status quo. It is now digesting

There is a presumption in elements are the judicial process for granting faculties (permission to make physical changes), CHOCESAN ACTVISO committees commission. There is much experience and expertise embodied in the system, and the system is about to be strengthened in ways already decided. Its record from the point of view of conservation is not such as to undermine confidence in it. On the contrary, it is no more prone to avoidable calamities than is the listed building control of secular buildings. The faculty jurisdiction has a wider reference (including furnishings and movable objects) and takes in wider considerations (including conformity to canon law) than does the planning apparatus of local government. It would therefore remain in place even if full listed building controls were made to apply to churches. There would then be duplication, something to be avoided if possible. The amazing exertions of local congregations in the upkeep of the Church of England's unparalleled architectural patrimony and the success of wider appeals in the case of major church buildings cannot be unconnected with the fact that the church has sole responsibility in the matter. Give the state control of what may be done to church buildings, and the state may well find that it has to provide more of the means for doing what has to be done: an unwelcome conclusion. Alterations to the interior of a church are often prompted by liturgical requirements, or by changes in the social practices of the church community. It is not appropriate that these issues, especially hiturgical, should be subject to decision by a secular tribunal set up for another purpose. That would qualify the right to freedom of worship, something for which very strong justification would have to be shown. There can be detected in some of the pressure for supplanting ecclesiastical with lay control the disgruntlement of churchmen who do not like the turn their communions have taken and look to secular authority as a way of putting a bridle on it. Secular authority should be wary of those blandishments.

These reasons have to do with autonomy and the proper dis-tinction between civil regulation and ecclesiastical order. They some cost (though the cost need not be significant) to the integrity of the "heritage". That is not to say that the present arrangements should remain exactly as they are. Any listed church which falls out of use and becomes a candidate for demolition should lose the exemption: at present Anglican churches made redundant under the Pastoral Measure do not. Partial demolition - Victorian inner city churches from which community and congregation have ebbed are much at risk should perhaps be made subject to listed building consent at the discretion of the Secretary of State: Grants should continue to be given only on condition that the planning authorities are consulted about any future alterations to the building. And the position of churches other than the Church of England needs to be reconsidered. It is best that they should continue to enjoy parity of treatment, but that will require rather more effort on their part. They do not have internal controls comparable to the Church of England's faculty jurisdiction. They have not the resources, nor does the number of their listed buildings call for anything so elaborate. Nevertheless they can reasonably be required to adopt procedures that satisfy these three requirements: that the architectural, aesthetic and historical implications of any proposal for alteration are thoroughly examined and plainly put; that there is an open forum for their consideration, with time and opportunity for expert views and public feelings to be registered; and that the ecclesiastical authorities in each communion demonstrate that they attach proper weight to that side of the argument. It would be easier for the smaller churches to manage that if the Churches Main Committee, say, was able to provide "common services" of a

Sir, Dr Wales (September 20) suggests that death certificates are intended to fulfil the epidemiological function of recording those diseases which affected the deceased in life, as well as fulfilling their legal function.

This is not so. A moment's, thought makes it clear that no practitioner could hope to produce such a record, and indeed the disorders to be inserted on the medical certificate of cause of death are specifically restricted to those g part of the chain of events which led to death (section I), and those, not part of the chain, that contributed to the death (section II). There is no provision for recording conditions which were present but which were thought not to contribute. Thus, unless Dr Wales thinks that sufferers from diabetes always die because of their diabetes, the results he quotes suggest that some practitioners, at least, follow the instructions faithfully.

I have long thought that provision should be made on the certificate (perhaps a section III) for recording conditions present but irrelevant to the cause of death, for fear that they may otherwise be recorded, misleadingly, as if relevant. Diabetes is an excellent example and so, in many cases, are chronic disorders such as occupational lung diseases.

professional kind.

The role of this section III would be to help purify from irrelevancies the statistics of cause of death, not to provide a summary of the deceased's medical history. Such a change might well be acceptable to Parliament, unlike any changes which involved an attempt at official recording of further background

Graduate recruitment

From the Principal of the London Business School

Sir, Your headline, "Business your September 15 article based on a recent Harbridge House Europe report is somewhat out of gear (to mix metaphors) with the experience of this school.

All the usual yardsticks bear this out. The quantity and quality of applicants measured by intellectual attainments and postgraduate ex-perience are high; job offers at the end of the programme are more than satisfactory in terms of salary and job responsibility, as well as the range of companies who recruit from the school (some 400 over the past 10 years).

What complaints we receive are generally more along the lines of the difficulty companies have in recruiting in any particular year because, after allowing for sponsored graduates and those returning overseas. only some 80 or so are available for the UK market.

You quote LRS salaries and suggest they are modest in comparison with Harvard - a world leade against whom we are very willing to be judged. However, the salaries quoted are besically domestic salaries for LBS graduates employed in the UK and for Harvard graduates employed in the USA. LBS salaries for 1983 graduates who were employed abroad are a better comparator and are some 40 per cent higher than for the UK, which narrows the gap considerably, particularly when it is borne in mind that USA managerial salaries generally are considerably higher than in

We at LBS are not complacent and aim to serve the British economy where skills are most needed. We operate in a market economy and would not wish otherwise. Hence, whilst we insist that all our graduates acquire from us a broad managerial education before specialization is allowed, the choice for the latter is primarily market driven and will thus vary from time to time with the changing structure of the economy. #### Aiding Central America From Professor J. Lynch and others

Sir, The tour earlier this year of Western Europe by Costa Rican President Luis Alberto Monge resulted in a commitment by the EEC governments, together with Spain and Portugal, to participate in a conference in San José at the end of this month with the five Central American republics and the four members of the Contadora Group. While there are still serious differences among some of the Latin American countries involved, all are united in seeking a greater commitment by Western Europe to a solution of the Central American impasse. A previous effort a year ago by the five Central American republics to secure additional financial and economic support from Western Europe was a resounding failure. Although a joint request for funding was a major achievement in itself, the low-level European delegation

From Mr David Sylvester Sir, If we are looking for a civilized and dignified means to finance the housing of our national art collec-tion - to echo J. M. Richards's phrases (September 24) - is not the answer to be found in selling off a

And should the same principle not also apply to other museums of ours which urgently need funds for extensions or repairs while masterpieces are piled up in their cellars?

Our vast holdings of great art are shown, or not shown, in spaces so inadequate as to make it absurd, not to say shameful, that we cling to them as greedily as we do.

Sir, Clifford Longley's article (September 25) highlights the sup-posed political sympathies of Church of England clergymen, taken over the last five years.

Just for the record, nobody has ever asked me my opinions and the same is true for a number of other priests I have spoken to.

Perhaps, Sir, you will permit me to register what would appear to be a small minority point of view, lest it go unrecorded? Because they add nothing to the quality of life or the vision of God, I reject the value of David Jenkins's remarks, and those of his supporters on this subject, as being seriously mischievous, repellent to truth, and naive in the extreme. #### Failures in the 'Englandspiel'

From Mr Christopher M. Woods Sir, As keeper of the SOE (Special Operations Executive) Archive in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office I wish to place on record some facts and comments concern-ing last night's BBC programme (September 25) on the Englandspiel.

But first may i correct the impression given by your report (August 28) that the BBC received less official help in its research for this programme than for others in the series. The FCO did not withhold assistance, but it was not responsible for the content of the programme.

No one disputes that Holland was the scene of SOE's most tragic wartime disaster nor that this was due in part to mistakes and errors of judgment by SOE, What I hoped to see, and felt viewers would expect from a documentary programme presenting the story from the British side, was some illumination of how and why SOE in good faith went

Instead SOE was presented in simplistic terms as almost enminally negligent and the programme built up to a final suggestion that there was still some unrevealed mystery behind it all.

There is no trace of any justification for this in the SOE archive and the whole presentation struck me as untair, not only to viewers, but to all SOE participants in the tragedy, both British and Dutch.

In early 1942, when the first crucial errors occurred, SQE was a new organization and had not yet refined through experience the techniques on which later successes were built.

For instance "security checks", on which criticism hinges, were still rudimentary and often unreliable (mistakes in coding or transmission, atmospheric distortion, haste and stress). Moreover, when the first wireless agent was caught he had on him three coded messages in which he had already included his correct check. Was it really so easy for SQE to detect that he was under control? There were other complicating factors. If it had all been as straightforward as the programme suggested, it is strange that SOE's internal security investigation whom suspicions were really aroused did not fasten on the early omission of security checks.

The Dutch section was a late starter - Holland was not the easiest country for SOE to operate in - and zeal to get on may have impaired the section's judgment. But once a combination of luck and skill had enabled the enemy to control from the start the whole of SOE's original network, it was not easy to escape from such a stranglehold. That SOE broke loose in 1943 was thanks to the Dutch agents who managed to blow the gaff. They did so, let it be recorded too, in time for SOE with the Dutch to start again in 1944 to create a new network which helped Dutch Resistance to play its part in the final campaign and the liberation of Holland.

Yours sincerely, CHRISTOPHER M. WOODS, SOE Adviser Foreign and Commonwealth Office,

Civil Service ethics

King Charles Street, SW1.

From Mr Michael J. Ellion Sir. Ronald Butt (September 20) misses the point of my paper to the Royal Institute of Public Administration. My central argument was that, because neither Parliament nor the courts had developed effective techniques for constraining govern-ment, the Civil Service has in practice become the major way in which government is scrutinised.

As Peter Hennessy accurately reported (September 17), I do not find that state of affairs desirable for much the same reasons as Ronald Butt. But I certainly believe that we would be mad to undermine the ability of the Civil Service to check and constrain government without putting something better in

It is on that search for new constitutional arrangements that the real debate should focus. It is much too simple to characterise these concerns as, in some way, opposed to a strong government, determined 10 effect cultural change. The strongest government is one whose back is so broad that it can bear rods

The question of how effective government is in practice rendered accountable (it will not do to answer 'By Parliament") is a weighty one at least. Lord Scarman appears to think so, and I doubt if I am alone in treating his view of the Constitution with great respect. ## Aphrodisiac could destroy cockroaches

Science report

Sunday.

N.Y.T. - Chemists at Yale University have produced a cockroach aphrodisiae, and a company is negotiating with the university to test and market it.

The result could be a new way of killing Periplaneta americana, the American cockroach, which now infests seven continents and is particularly well-known in the New York area. The synthetic substance, called Periplanone-B, would lure the insects into traps treated with insecticide. -

It was a "flash of cureka", said Dr Stuart L. Schreiber, associate professor of organ chemistry at Yale, of the moment when he and Courad Santini, a research associate, succeeded in the synthesis after two-and-a-half years of fruitless labour.
The discovery has hallmarks of a great success. according to Dr Charles Remington, curator of the Museum of Natural History at Yale. Pointing to famines in some parts of the Third World, he said that cockroaches often diminished food stocks and that the synthesized sex attractant could save lives. Several fentograms (one thousand millionth of a milfionth of a gram) of Periplanone-B is potent enough to send half a dozen male cockroaches into sexual frenzies leading to their deaths, Dr

They immediately stand on their back legs and start flapping their wings madly. This frantic phase lasts for about 20 minutes and is followed by a 15-minute cooling-off period, he said. They are then suffering from severe latigue, he continued. Sexual attractants in nontoxic biological lures are now beginning to be used to control gypsy moths, Dr Remington said. Yale's cockroach aphredisinc appeals only to the American cockroach, which numbers about one thousand million in New York, he said.

In northern cities, American cockreaches are outnumbered slightly by German cock-roaches, which are smaller and lighter brown. More than a decade ago scientists who studied the brains of male cockroaches recognized the power of the pheromone, sexual excitant, produced by virgin females. To duplicate the internal workings of virgin female, Schreiber and Santini marshalled the powers of modern instruments: a rotary evaporator, low-temperature cooling baths, high-pressure liquid chromatography, an infra-red spectrometer and a nuclear magnetic resonance

For more than two years, the search for the elusive pheromone led nowhere. It had high priority for Schreiber because a breakthrough could lead to the engineering of similar sought-after com-pounds, known as 10-member ring compounds, to control growth in plants and deter insects from feeding. ...

Dr Michael Leruer, neurobiologist at Yale Medical School, tested the synthesized Peripianone-B. The antennae of females showed no response when exposed to the suh stance, but the male fired off an electrical signal, Lerner

He became well aware of the important part psychology would play in the future development of educational practice. He did much to further the understanding and use of statistical methods in eQu cational and psychological research in Great Britain. In addition, he made novel contributions to the study of the reliability of mental tests and the measurement of social Thouless, in Straight and Crooked Thinking handled with wit the pitfalls of "tabloid" thinking. With hardly concealed gusto he dissected and exposed 34 dishonest tricks in argument, in a chapter which members of debating societies may have hology, Thouless's attitude was never the fashionable one of polite interest coupled with doof scepticism. After returning to Cambridge he pursued his own investigations, and his contributions were recognised by election to the Presidency of the Society for Psychical Research (1942).

He was personally satisfied of the experimental and critical soundnes of some well-publicised investigations discussing these in Experimental Psychical Research (1963). From Anec-dote to Experiment in Psychical Research (1972) was an absorbing study, written with toughness and common sense, and was a notable contribution to the study of psychical research.

While he did not allow the teachings of psychoanalysts 10 permeate his psychological , systems as deeply as some of his ... contemporaries did, he was always open to the suggestion .. that objective methods could be applied to many unconscious happenings, and took part in some early attempts to apply to dream-analysis the techniques of measuring the psych-galvanic reaction.

Thouless appears to have had no ambition to found, or even to join, a "school" of psychological thought. In the realm of science he was outstandingly independent; in the world of religion this seemed less certain. What is beyond doubt is that he was an eminently friendly, fairminded and fearless thinker.

Executive Editor Kenneth Fleet

Fraser shareholders put to the test

The proper working of the British System depends uniquely on observance of the spirit as well as the letter of the law. This is as true in business as it is in politics.

Although not legal in the strict sense, Lourho's grudging undertaking to the Department of Trade and Industry not to vote its 29.9 per cent of the House of Fraser against the reelection of the chairman, Professor Roland Smith, was taken at its face value by the Department. After all it was part of a bargain in which Lonrho was left free to vote, and canvass others to vote, for two more Lonrho nominees on the Fraser board and to press for formal restrictions on the board's ability to manage Fraser in the interests of all Fraser shareholders.

CATALON CONTRACTOR

The DTI however, persistently underestimates or perhaps fears Lonrho, or rather its formidable and determined chief executive, Mr "Tiny" Roland, and battery of lawyers. The undertaking on Professor Smith's reelection, as with undertakings given to the DTI after the Monopolies Commission report in 1981, has been interpreted soley according to the letter. Lonrho, simply went out to persuade others - friends, foes and committed alike - to vote Professor Smith off the board.

Everyone outside Lonrho's sphere of influence realizes that without Professor Smith and his fellow director, Mr Ernest Sharp, the Fraser board would have been hard put to it to resist Lourho's relentless battering. Mr Sharp's position on the board is also at risk at today's annual meeting in Glasgow, as Lonrho will throw its 29.9 per cent, as well as its influence, against him. If one or both are voted down, Lonrho will be jubilant. And rightly so, for Mr Rowland will have made a giant leap toward his goal: Lonrho's acquisition, by one means or another, and at minimum cost, of House of Fraser and with it. Harrods.

It would be the height of foolishness for other Fraser shareholders to play Lonrho's game. Even those who claim an open mind on the relative merits of the protagonists, cannot think it is in their interest to further Lourho's cause in advance of the Monopolies Commission's finding, expected before the year end, on the nature and state of Lonrho's original undertakings not to extend its power over Fraser through the acquisition of more Fraser shares.

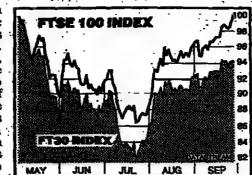

The Merchant Navy Pension Fund. among institutional shareholders, has a particular responsibility to do the right thing. And that, without a scintilla of doubt, is to keep Professor Smith and Mr Sharp on the board and as far as possible maintain the status quo, at least until the Commission has reported and the air is

The FT-SE index shows its worth

The London stock market rose to a record yesterday. But this ostensibly significant event received scant attention in the City. Part of the reason, possibly, lay in the distracting effect of the "Stop the City" demonstrations. The other factor was that the record was struck in the seven-monthold FT-SE 100-share index, rather than the time-honoured FT Industrial Ordinary index, covering 30 leading shares.

The chart shows that the two indices have taken quite different paths since they touched all-time highs simultaneously on May 3 this year. While the 30-share index carried on plunging, the FT-SE showed more resilience in the latter part of May: This gap was reinforced during the summer, and has tended to widen during the stock marker's recent recovery. The result is that, while the FT-SE was celebrating a record 1144.1 yesterday, the Industrial Ordinary at 872,0 was still 50 points below its peak.

Logically, this only goes to demonstrate how outmoded the 30-share index is. After all, the FT-SE embraces the constituents of the older index and 70 more besides. The extra shares include banks and insurance companies, as well as the tobacco and insurance giant BAT Indus-tries. Apart from the banks, these have been among the leading sectors on the stock market over the past six months.

But it will be a long time before the FT-SE replaces the 30-share index as a barometer of sentiment in the financial community as a whole. In that sense, its performance and the reaction to it are mutually self-feeding. The more cheerful thought for the public at large is that the FT-SE index more faithfully reflects the behaviour of a typical institutional fund manager's portfolio - the sort, in fact, which determines the fate of our pensions and insurance policies.

CBI pushes for status quo status quo

The Confedration of British Industry paints such a rosy picture of the British economy in its representations to the Chancellor before his autumn economic statement that Mr Nigel Lawson could be forgiven for preening himself.

Outcry, says the CBL, is better than the official figures show, with a forecast rise of 2.5 per cent this year, despite the coal strike, and nearer 3 per cent in 1985 if the strike is over by then. Real profitability is rising strongly towards the international norm; inflation trends are even better than shown by the retail price index; companies ate expecting a record financial surplus despite the biggest real rise in investment since the war. So, says the CBI, this is not the time to rock the boat. Instead, budgetary policy should be aimed at increasing the competitiveness of British industry so that British firms can provide

This is sound, encouraging stuff. When it comes to prescriptions however, the CBI betrays that its proposals have been drawn up by a committee.

Taxation is too high. The Government should aim to cut the general level of taxation back to 1978-79 levels by 1989-90. Public spending should be cut to fit that level of taxation. On the other hand, ministers should be looking for more short-term cuts in capital spending. Far from it. Indeed, they should be spending an extra £1 billion a year on cost-effective infrastructure projects, including an extra £300m a year on roads for each of the next

10 years.
This circle must be squared by cutting government's current spending by £6 billion a year over four years - a task which the CBI supposes has been taken care of for the benefit of Treasury ministers in its paper on "Efficiency in the Public 'Services". The need for such attempts to square the circle is, in case it be forgotten, a result of unemployment spoiling the Government's financial equations. If unemployment were lower, the need for such unconvincing reasoning would disappear.

The CBI may, therefore, be on stronger ground in its call for more direct aid to competitiveness. Autumn is the time when public spending and National Insurance confibutions are dealt with rather than the budget as a whole...

National Insurance contributions do increase the cost of labour directly and therefore presumably reduce demand. Any moves geared to cut labour costs must surely help that central policy problem and any measures that would increase labour costs should be resisted.

Putting UK first in the North Sea

By David Young

The Government is determined that offshore oil contracts should principally benefit British construction firms

From the air all North Sea oil production platforms look the same. The first sight of a platform through the clouds is impressive as orange flames roar from the flare stack and the drilling derricks tower above the heli-deck.

Down in the dining rooms the array of fresh sea-foods, salads and steaks helps compensite for the two-week-on and two-week-off routine as much as providing the autrition needed to work for 12 hours at a stretch in one of the world's stretch in one of the world's harshest environments. Roughnarkest environments. Rough necks and roughage do not seem to go together and doctors have found problems associated with the low-fibre diet of many North Sea workers. However, producing oil is the point of the platforms and it is the technical details and the engineering breakthroughs achieved by their designers and down to the sea-bed 600ft below giving it a technical advantage: Beryl B has its centrally placed drilling derricks and power plant to give it the advantage of lower weight and increased stability and the forthcoming Marathon Brae B platform will draw on the experience of the adjoining Brae A to make it as efficient and cost effective as

However, there is the prob-lem that all these technological breakthroughs were achieved at considerable cost and much of the foreign know-how had to be possible.

The North Sea lessons are seen as a saleable commodity and the problem in the past has been that Britain has not benefited as much as it should have from this. Too many techniques learnt have not been sold on to British companies.

For that reason the Department of Energy will be examining applications in the forthcoming ninth round of North Sea licensing in considerable detail. Any company also putting forward development plans for existing discoveries in the North Sea will be asked to make sure that as much technology as possible is passed on to British companies to enable them to win a larger share of the business.

The excuse that "we can not

If a proposal does not contain at least 72 per cent British content - even an 80 per cent yardstick might be applied - it will not be allowed. Any oil will not be allowed. Any oil company which does not go as far as it can to use an even higher percentage of British equipment will find that the Department of Energy's memory is a long one and future proposals will be reviewed in the light of rest performance. the light of past performance.

Whether that prospect was uppermost in the mind of Mr J. L. "Corky" Frank, the United Kingdom head of Marathon,

> Mr Frank's explanation of his day for the United Kingdom offshore industry in the words of an enthusiastic Mr Alick Buchanan-Smith, the Energy Minister – is more flattering for Britain.

The reason, according to him, is: that the British yards tendering met not only price specifications. Foreign bids were lower, but Marathon's experience in hulding the huga Beau ence in building the huge Brae A platform - the company is unusual in the North Sea in carrying out its own project ment - led it to return. to British yards.

A company like Marathon has shown that it would never let nationalistic pressures get in the way of decisions involving investment of about £1.7 billion per platform, so the Department of Energy can probably be forgiven for its excessive display of public delight at the an-

Mr John D'Ancona, head of the Department's Offshore Supplies Office which steers as much work as it can to Britain and tries to sell British oil industry's know-how abroad, is even more publicly approving of the Martthon decision.

"It is the mirror image of the decision made by North Sea Oil at the start of the year when when he announced last week they (Sun Oil representatives) that 100 per cent of the went abroad with their contract construction contracts for the for the Balmoral Field platform," he said.

Marathon took a respon-sible view and the Braith pards responded responsibly and we have won these important contracts. This is the way that the business should operate in Later next month Mr Peter-Walker, the Secretary of State for Energy will officially inaug-urate the Mobil Beryl B platform in the Beryl field 170 miles north-east of Aberdeen. The field now has six of its 21 proposed wells ready and perfectly illustrates the technical demands placed on engineers to bring fields into production economically.

The Beryl platform has its share of North Sea firsts, including its drilling systems and the use of Roll-Royce RB211 "jumbo" engines for gas compression and electricity generation. To the best of our knowledge no other major offshore installation has equalled this percentage." The Government intends

STOCK MARKET REPORT

FT-SE presses on to record high

By Derek Pain and Jonathan Clare

Shares, as measured by the FT-SE 100 index, hit a new peak yesterday, "Footsie" grew stronger as the day progressed. It opened with a modest 1.1 points gain but by the close was recording an 8.6 per cent. advance, taking it to a record

The previous high was achieved in May when it touched 1,141.6.

But as "Footsie" went from strength to strength, the much more widely quoted FT 30 share index managed a mere 3 points rise to 872 points - still 50 points below the high it reached in May.

Shares were encouraged by falling US interest rates and another better performance by sterling on the foreign exchange market. Whispers of some progress in the miners' dispute also helped but, in general, the market continued to shrug off over the worries confrontation.

Shares of Oldacre Holdings are expected to come to the stock market on Wednesday through an introduction arranged by Stock Beech, the broker. There are already more than 200 shareholders. Oldacre, which has Mr Alan Bartlett (formerly with Newman Industries) as a non-executive director, achieved profits of £2.5m in the year ended-March. The company's interests spread from animal feed to vehicle distribution.

have been as high as 360p this year. Grandmet, which fell 8p on Wednesday, has been unsettled by brokers' downgrading Natwest 35p. Panmure Gordon, one of the company's brokers, yesterday reduced its projection for the year from £337m which represents little, if any, second half year growth. For next year Panmure Gordon is shooting for £370m.

Such estimates are well below the heady figures which have been circulating in the City, Some analysts abve been going for £370m this year with, perhaps, £430m next year.

But it is how being suggested that the City failed to react to some of the warning noises which have emerged from Grandmet since its interim statement in May.

In recent years Grandmet has reaped rich rewards from such activities as cheap US cigarettes and London casinos. Both have been hit recently by the cold wind of much more intense competition. It seems that below expectation performances from these two divisions are the main factors behing the Panmure Gordon downgrading. The borker, however, remains keen on Grandmet. It has advised clients not to sell the shares. However some borkers be-lieve Grandmet forecasts arebeing pulled back too far. One hiterot anticipating £370m has cut his projection to £360m.

In the financial services shakeup Hogg, with its retail network, has become an attractive proposition. American Express is one which has been linked with the company on a number of occasions.

Among money brokers Mills and Allen International gained 10p to 328p, It is floating off its advertising side and its figures are due next month.

Shares of Fergabrook, the leisure goods and toys distribu-tor, floated on the USM at 74p last week, climbed 3p to 92p yesterday. One reason for the progress is that one of its main suppliers, the American Lewis Galoob toys group, will obtain a US over-the-counter share presence today. There are suggesbuyer of Fergabrook shares.

The all-round strength of the market was reflected in the shares of investment trusts which recorded modest gains throughout the list. Latest USM newcomer, The British Bloodstock Agency got off to a racing start. Placed at 165p the shares romped ahead to 205p before settling at 203p. East Lancashire Paper Group dvanced 23p to 63p on the take over approach.

Sangers, where Mr Tom Whyte has 48 per cent, was suspended on a signalled American acquisition, believed to be a cosmetics business. Terms have been agreed but Sangers is awaiting an accoun-

A summary of the unaudited consolidated results for Vickers P.L.C. for the six months ended 30th June 1984 is given on the right. For comparative purposes, in addition to the actual published results for 1983, two additional columns have been inserted restating the figures on the basis that the Australian interests had been treated as an associated company throughout 1983.

Trading and Dividend

The improvement in our trading performance, which became apparent towards the end of 1983, has continued during the first six months of 1984 and is reflected by an increase in profit before extraordinary items to £12.3 million, from £5 million for the equivalent period in 1983. Some £3 million of this improvement is attributable to reduced interest charges due to a further substantial reduction in borrowings.

The Board has declared an interim dividend of 4.0p (1983 3.0p) per £1 Ordinary Stock, equivalent with associated tax credit to 5.7p (1983 4.29p) gross. The interim dividend will cost £3.6 million and will be paid on 7th November 1984, to Stockholders on the Register at

All main businesses performed satisfactorily, the largest improvement in profit being shown by Rolls-Royce Motors where production and sales achieved budgeted levels and the strong U.S. dollar contributed to improved

Assuming there is no escalation of the current national industrial relations problems, profitability during the second half is expected to be generally comparable with the first six months removing the imbalance between the first and second halves which has tended to be a chance feature of the results in recent years.

Earlier in the year, as reported in the Annual Accounts for 1983, our engineering interests in Australia were merged with those of Commonwealth Steel Company Limited into a new company Comsteel Vickers Limited where our equity interest is now 38 per cent.

Following this merger substantial rationalisation has been necessary, the cost of which has been provided for in this period. Comsteel Vickers Limited also incurred a pre-tax loss in the six month period to June 1984 reflecting the present depressed Australian engineering industry. Our share of this and the rationalisation costs are shown separately in the statement.

The Board has been considering the reacquisition of the Company's former interests in shipbuilding and engineering activities in Barrow-in-Furness when they are returned to the private sector. The Board has concluded that these businesses do not fulfil our strategic aims. Therefore, whilst we should always consider realistic opportunities when they arise, it is now most unlikely that we will wish to reacquire these businesses.

Nationalisation Compensation The claim by the Company for additional compensation in respect of its former shipbuilding business and aircraft interests, nationalised in 1977, continues to be vigorously pursued and both cases have now been referred to the European Court of Human Rights.

NOTES

* For comparative purposes the 1983 results of Vickers P.L.C. have been restated to show Vickers Australia Limited as an associate, following the merger between that company and Commonwealth Steel Company Limited on 16th February 1984 and the resulting change in the Group's interest from a majority holding in Vickers Australia Limited (66.1 %) to a minority holding in the merged business (38 %).

The results shown as previously reported for the year 1983 have been extracted from the full accounts which received an unqualified auditors' report and have been filed with the Registrar of Companies.

SPECIAL REPORT

During the past four years considerable restructuring of the Company has been taking place and its progress reported to Stockholders. ## Dunlop prospects hinge on reconstruction

Any results from Dunlop these days are almost irrelevant in the context of the £400m-plus debt which hangs around the group's neck. The way forward is not through its trading performance but through a successful completion of the capital reconstruction package. Confidence still runs high that it will be completed some time next month. The problems are not ones of principle but of the practical terms of what promises to be a highly complicated deal.

There is no doubt that without the reconstruction, the remains of the Dunlop group will go the same way as the European tyre business which was instrumental in creating the current mess.

There are still enough good businesses in the group to allow its recovery, and given the restrictions on working capital imposed by the financial problems, there are suffiviable trading future.

Yesterday's interim results showed pretax profits of £16m. up from £2m; on the surface a good improvement. However, the results of the European tyre business are excluded.

On a strict comparison profits would have been down by £3m. That was largely due to a poor performance from Malaysia, a little worrying, given that this is one of the favourite targets for sale as part of the reconstruction.

The group is not kidding itself that the reconstruction will be the bonanza it needs. However, it will allow the flexibility which Dunlop needs to operate effeciently and effectively.

George Wimpey

George Wimpey's interim results reveal the underlying lack of perfermance in British activities, especially on the housing front. The company's pretax profits for the half year were £23.1m, but £17m of that was accounted for by the sale of half its stake in Oldham Estates. Once that is stripped out, pretax profits are down to £6.1m compared with £8.2m for the same period last year.

Housing sales have slowed Wimpey Homes selling 4,500 houses, a negligible risc on last year. The company attributes this to high interest rates deterring first time buyers; who make up 60 per cent of its housebuilding

Wimpey also admits that it has been affected by the adverse publicity attached to limber frame housing which makes up 60 per cent of its developments. Profit margins are being squeezed by the need to offer financial incentives to homebuyers, although the company will not put a figure

Wimpey's finance director says that all the group's operations are coming under scrutiny in an attempt to climinate non profitable em-ployment of assets. It is part of the process started earlier in the year when the housebuilding contracting functions were separated under the new chairman, Mr Clifford Chet-

The company would not be drawn as to where cuts may come, but its overseas contracting operation which suffered a £41.7m loss last year, is very quiet at the moment.

Property disposals added £63.7m to George Wimpey's coffers to offset contracting losses but the company says it intends going ahead with its redevelopment of the Little Britain site in the City of London, among other schemes.

There will be a rise in borrowings but the company says this will decline at the year end because of the scasonal nature of the construction industry, an area where profit margins are also squeezed.

Tootal

The decks are being cleared at Tootal for a takeover bid. That is the explanation for the unusual decision to write off £26m at the interim stage.

The bulk of these write-offs relate to the American Thread operation, and it is apparently this which Tootal's potential suitor. Nottingham Manufac-turing, has had most reservations about.

Tootal has officially declared its restructuring complete, and has celebrated the group's transformation with an 84 per cent increase in pretax interim profits to £8.26m. The dividend has been bumped up by 4 per cent to 1.23p net, and the figures hold out the promise of similar improvements at the final stage, even though £1.5m of the profit was from property sales. The other disappointing area is sales of way hatiks to West Africa. The region's economic problems have cut demand to the point where once substantial profits are now negligible. Faced with such had luck, all Tootal can do is sit and hope the market picks up.

But is in the other parts of the group that the new strength is showing through. Clothing, which suffered from ineffectual marketing of the branded products, has capitalized on its position with Marks and Spencer and similar outlets. and has achieved much greater

England go forward with a new quartet

One surprise new choice appears in a powerful and experienced England team to play Wales at Ebbw ale on October 14. He is Hugh Waddell, the robust former Staf-fordshire Rugby Union forward who went to Blackpool to ask for trials with the second division club. Blackpool Borough, and has made a big impact in the past two seasons. Waddell, who scored the two late tries with which Blackpool overturned the first devision leaders. Oldham, in the Lancashire Cup, has been watched by several first division clubs, including Hull Kingston Rovers. He is one of four Kingston Rovers. VOLLEYBALL

Preparing for lift-off

Living with failure can be impossible, but coping with success can also bring problems, as the English Volleybull Association is finding out.

Volleyball has reached the launching pad, the EVA is sure of that. What it needs now is the propulsion to lift it into orbit. After the success of last year's televised events in Britain and the reflected glory of the Olympic tournament, businessmen, admen and PR men are agreed that volleyball is the right vehicle for products aimed at the upwardly mobile. Britsic, the soft drink manufacturers, are already on board, with a three-year agreement to sponsor the national league worth around £30,000, Others can be persuaded to take the trip, and the EVA is heavily involved in negotiations which are, as they say, "at a delicate stage".

Volleyball has been a late starter in Britain. It did not begin in carnes: here until the late 1990s, mainly through the influence of Polish immigrants. The growing-up pro-cess has been a long and, at times, painful one. The signs are, however. that the sport now knows where it wants to go.

The policy of running special events each year with the backing of television is to be continued, with invitations already sent out to some of the world's top teams to come to Britain next year for two fournaments. Nest year will also be the sport's junior development year, while the EVA are sure more can be of catching people's interest.

This weekend sees the first cound

London will also be announcing a when they are carry injuries. divisional squad in training for their

The divisional selectors approach the games pragmatically. They are picking the team they think will stand the best chance of bearing Australia. As things stand this is obvious, but in terms of a sustained divisional competition which once we had, now have no longer, but which many would see again, it goes

The Midlands, for instance include Hare, the Leicester fullback, in their squad of three dozen. London have asked Colclough, the Wasps lock, to captain their side to meet the Australians in the opening tour match on October 17, But both players have stated their intention of confining their rugby to club games rather than internationals, whereas any divisional competition would lead naturally towards possible England status. There would therefore be little point in selecting players for a divisional side who did not want to represent their country.

cleft stick in which English rugby finds itself. The North have an additional problem: of their 51additional planters of their strong squad, four will be at Cambridge University, who obviously wish to have them present during this term's club programme. The quartet are Andrew, recently elevated to the England bench: Clough, the former Durham University centre, who is due to start at Cambridge this term: Simms, the Liverpool centre, and Ellicon, the Headingle, No 8.

All must be regarded as contenders for the North side to play Australia at Waterloo on November 28. On the same day, Cambridge play their annual match against Mickey Steele-Bodger's XV, a game in which potential Blues have been known to be made or unmade. A good showing in a divisional match could clinch a place in the England sound; the same can hardly be said. equad; the same can hardly be said of the Universities game, Once again, the unfortunate player is faced with a clash of loyalties. We have known for a long time that the leading players have too much rugby. Tony Jorden, chairman of the London selectors, wrote to London clubs this month asking them to try wherever possible not to impose extra demands. This is not a new step, but the players themselves often feel that they must appear as often as possible to get themselves noticed and do so sometimes even It was pointed out recently to one player who will be at Twickenham tomorrow that he would actually harm his cause by playing in every game possible if the played badly. But that is a risk many will run for fear of losing ground to their rivals. It is the established players who can afford to lay down some of their own ground rules, for example they that will play only one game a week and would prefer not to appear on the week-end before an inter-

How many established players do England have at the moment? Wherever you go, you encounter technical administrators who say there is too much rugby and not enough training for rugby. You do not learn skills in matches where, to may touch the ball two or three times only.

Were they to be in the same position as Steve Bainbridge, with claims to national selection, they would not suffer the same fate. In Bainbridge's case, with him playing in England, he is automatically suspended for 30 days. Further disciplinary action ensures that he will not play for England this season. ## England's vice-captain prepares for India

Gatting should be well suited to wobble bowlers

Barnes

What was the worst moment is the summer's Test matches? Well, it What was the worst mo has to be admitted that the competition for that particular accolade is pretty intense. For all that, Mike Gatting's farewell appearance has to be fairly high on the list.

Gatting went for one in the first. Innings, leg-before to Marshall without playing a stroke. But in the second innings it seemed that, in his very last chance, he was actually coming good: 29 scored, an air of confidence about him. Then along came a straight one from Marshall. Up went the bat, out of harm's way, thud went the hall into pad, up went the umpire's finger and down went the ampire's finger and down went all Gatting's hopes. He was publicly revealed as the only man in the world with an Achilles heel that goes up to the knee.

It was getting close to time", he said. "It was a question of trying no to play at wide balls. And...well.... didn't play at a straight one." His disappointment was so intense one could not fail to share it. But be did not leave the Test arena a broken man. He worked off his disappointment on every bowler on the county circuit, finished top of the averages with nearly 70, and had the season's ighest score, 258. There is one theory that Gatting is the finest player of mediocre bowling in the country. His achievements on the country circuit, and the fact that he is an immensely solid cricketing citizen, have won him the post of vice-captain to David Gower on the winter trip to India: yet another last chance. And the theory continues that the land of the medium pace webble bowlers will be like heaven for M.W. Gatting. Gatting himself is sceptical. "Test cricket is always different. The bowling is better, the catching is better: everything is tuned a little higher. But that is not why I have failed." Note here that Gatting uses inhesitatingly the taboo parase for al sportsman: I failed. But you would expect someone with his looks to think in so uncompro-

Superior attack-

"It was not the difficulties of facing a superior attack. The fallures were of my own making. If I could just put my finger on it . . . I tell myself it shouldn't be too much of a problem. I should be doing reil." Perhaps it is the very desire for success that causes failure: the deadly wisdom of not swishing at the wide ones that leads to the lofted but for the straight one.

"I don't get out like that in county cricket . . . but on the other hand, it doesn't matter how I get out, does it?" Everyone knows that Gatting is good at batting. However, these days, the expression of this truth always carries the rider "at that level".

It needed more than mere county batting excellence to get him back into an England party. The fact that Gower likes to have this splendidly dependable thap to talk to between overs is also vital. As a batsman, Gatting might not have made it. As a vice-captain, he is a natural choice,

In truth, the ranport with Gower, is more potential than established fact: Catting has played Test matches under Gower's captaincy just three times: Faisalabad, Lahore, and Lord's "He's the kind of man who likes to lead from the front, as he did at Lahore", Gatting said, "His ability as a player means that he commands respect from all of his players. And despite a disappointing season with the bat, he has lost neither his ability nor that respect."

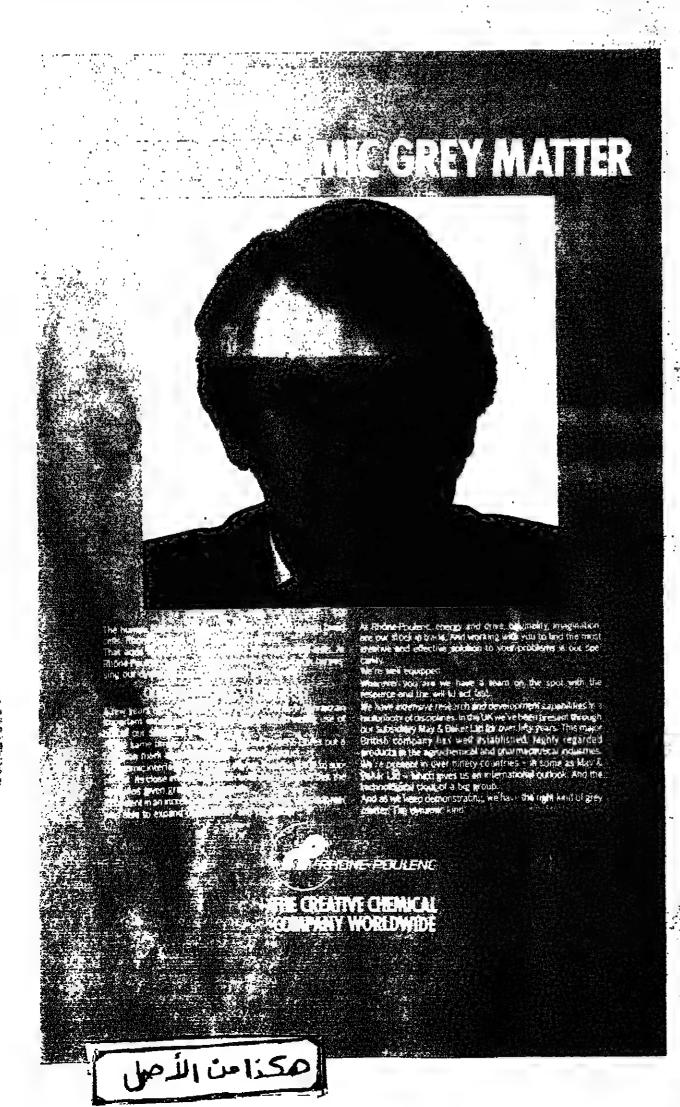

Solid, dependable, loyal: Gatting is well cast as the man to play Horatio to Gower's Hamlet. Meanwhile, that dashing, impetuous, character I. T. Botham will not be playing Lacrtes in this production, and Gatting is in no doubt that he will be missed. "He's always likely to make something happen. But, as he is the first to admit, eight years of solid cricket have taken it out of him.

It is the combination of stunning form against ordinary bowling and his rapport with Gower (hat will give Catting curry for Christmas. One can only hope that something will come of it: that they plot the downfall of the wobblemen, even though, after leading Middlesex for two seasons, Gatting still maintains he is a "beginner" at the captaincy business. And captaincy in the county championship, he said, makes very different demands from the job at Test level, where the responsibilities and the pressures enormous: sometimes the problems themselves are more straightforward, the issues more dear-cut.

"In a county match," he said, you must always be aware of where the other side is in the table, so you can, for example set a target that will tempt a poor side. With a side will tempt a poor size. With a sine near the top, you must set a stiffer target - you know they will go for it. But in a Test match, there are no outside factors to consider. You just have to go out and beat them."

Bell tolls for Shaw but Lloyd keeps Britain in contention

The match went Ostoja's way The match went Ostoja's way parily because Shaw's serving declined, parily because Shaw lacked the experience to play the important points as well as he needed to, but chiefly because Ostoja settled down, lost his inhibitions and played better and better as the match progressed. Ostoja found a solid and testing rightny with his returns, largely by taking the ball earlier and chancing his arm. He also began to put more the first day of their Davis cup playoff at Eastbourne yesterday. Marco

The young Yugoslavs do not fancy themselves as grass court players. Ostoja and Zivojinovic nevertheless gave Australia a strenuously challenging first day at Perth in February and the form they eventually struck at Eastbourne yesterday – once apprehension had given way to a measure of assurance—was not as surprising as it would have been a year ago.

Five times Ortoja protestad about time decisions in language that should have earned him a reprimand but did not. The last such protest, incorporating an obscenity, occurred in a game that gave him a critical break to 8–7 in the third set. By that time, Ostoja was hitting freely and showing signs of cockiness. Shaw stayed with him until that 8–7 game but Ostaja then assued command.

The match had a series of odd asides: the Yugoslav captain massaging Ostaja's shoulder, the British captain attending to Shaw's shoes with a wire brush, a 33-minute break for rain after the second set, the sounds of breaking glass, hammering and the tolling of a bell as Ostaja romped through the last mt.

Suddenly, though, Zivojinovic made all the pieces fit, and reminded us that he beat Lloyd in one of the two matches they played on hard courts in August. The rest of the match was a blazing due! in which an inch or so this way or that which an inch or so this way or that, gave one man or the other a fleeting advantage. The thunder of red-blooded Davis Cup tennis echoed around the stadium in fading light before play was halted for the night,

Australian returns

Sydney (Reuter) - Dianne Fromholtz, of Australia, who rettred from the international tennis circuit nearly two years ago because of injury, is planning a comeback, Miss Fromholtz, aged 28, was ranked in the world's top 10 between 1975 and 1979. She says she is bored sitting at home doing nothing and is keener to play now than the between for many years.

Earlier in the afternoon the family had had the pleasure of watching another home-bred winner when Tom Jones saddled Fouland to beat Pacific Gold and Multi System in the Clarence House Stakes. Now that Chief Singer has reverted to a mile, Never So Bold is the best sprinter in training in this country. "We were unlucky to be beaten by Petong and Habiti in the Vernon's Sprint Cup. Through no fault of the jockey's, he got left with too much to do after being denied a clear run early in the straight," Mr Kessly said. The Bisquit Cognac Challenge Stakes at Newmarket on October 18 has been nominated as the next target for yesterday's

Boezinge can bounce back to her best over favourite trip

By Mandaria (Michael Phillips)

by the way that she had worked carlier this week in preparation for today's race.

Our a point of handicapping.

Boezinge is not harshly treated on the 8st mark. When she won that nansery at Newbury last year she carried the same weight as Hilton Brown, one of her rivals today, and beat him by three lengths. Now, even with Simon Whitworth claiming 5th on Hilton Brown, my selection wil he getting 20th from him. him.

Hilton Brown has improved a lot this season, but if Boezinge is back to her best such a big concession in the season and when that experiment failed she was switched to her best such a big concession could easily prove too much. Harping back again to that nursery at Newbury last year Boezings beat. Susa Steel by two and a half lengths at level weights. At Newbury last Friday Susa Steel beat Saturnian by five lengths, again at level weights. Yet today Boezings will be receiving 9th punds from Saturnian. back to sprinting.

Running for the first time over five furlongs since she won a valuable nursery over the distance at Newbury last September, Bocat Newoury tast September, according to the year at Salisbury 16 days ago when she failed by just half a length to give 17lb to the older Saint Crespin Bay, if anything she looked a bit big in the paddock that day, so further improvement on he Capricorn Belle, Verchinina and Puger Sound, three of the nine runners for the Big "Q" Handicap Stakes finished fourth, fifth and sixth respectively behind Triagonal further improvement can be expected. Yesterday her trainer told me that he was greatly encouraged.

As a result Capricorn Belle will now be meeting Verchium; and Puget Sound on more than a stone worse terms, in this instance i just prefer Puget Sound, the racum of Pat Eddery.

Llints, who was beaten only a short head and half a longth by Sam's Wood and Torwar at Yarmouth nine days ago is preferred to Risk All. Miss Kuta Beach and The Villam for the Queensway Furniture Handheap Stakes. Before Furniture Handicap Stakes, Before that Yarmouth defeat my selection as she looked a shade unincky at Yarmouth she is taken to regain the winning trail now. Tour d'Or, my choice for the Final Straw Stakes won his first race at Salisbury earlier this month by five lengths, just half an hour before Polyknans did filewise. The differ-ence was their times, feur d'Or was the faster by almost a second.

All Along in fine form for Hern colt at repeat attempt on Arc

All Along now seems likely to try for a second victory in the Prix de landown me enough to tun in the Arc. A decision will be made to the week. The States in impeccable condition and the race did her a lot of good. She's gay and fresh and aimost certain to run in the Arc.

Suiting the Bowie set

By Derek Harris

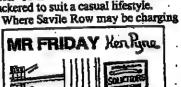

Paul Smith left school at 15 and started working to a clothing ware-house near Nottingham's lace market. Twenty two years on, that comparatively rare combination of successful designer and adept businessman, he has three London shops and has just opened one in Tokyo.

Through the doors of his Covent Garden shop, its mahogany fitments rescued from a chemist shop in Gioucestershire, come customers such as Paul McCartney, David Bowie and Mick Jagger, attracting also many a youngish merchant banker, commodity broker or ad agency man. Smith, his shock of black hair atop a 6ft 2in frame, says. There is an appeal in these clothes for the patently successful who do not have to try too hard for effect any more. This is an era of casual wear - there are many young people who have never worn a suit - so I make suits looser fitting with wider armholes so that they almost feel like casual wear."

Sharp, slim-fitting suits which sell well to those from the City still have the softer construction. Then there are linen suits with a textured finish, puckered to suit a casual lifestyle.

The desk-top copier every business can afford is now even better value.

Take advantage of these two great offers today!

The Xerox 1020

This small but powerful machine represents extremely good value. It will handle all your everyday copying needs with the Xerox high standards of copy quality and reliability. But with the added advantage that its compact size saves on office space. Now every business can afford to have one wherever it's needed, from a small office to a busy department.

As well as copying on standard A4, or up to B4, this no-fuss copier will also copy onto transparencies, coloured stock, self-adhesive labels, and even many preprinted letterheads. Crisp, clear copies, all at the touch

Naturally, like all Xerox copiers, the 1020 comes with the backing of a local service network available nationwide.

£150 Trade-in

For a limited period, Xerox will give you £150 trade-in against your existing copying equipment, regardless of its type or condition, when you choose a new Xerox 1020.

Free Finance Plan

If you do not have a machine you wish to trade-in, you can still take advantage of the Rank Xerox Free Finance Plan. You simply pay four equal instalments over 12 months. No deposit required and no interest to pay.

Please note, these offers may not be available from some distributors.

 You will not get much out of BBC Television's new, three-part adaptation of Shelagh Delaney's acaptation of shelagh Delaney's stage play A TASTE OF HONEY (BBC 2, 2.30pm) if you keep on comparing it with Tony Richardson's 1961 movie. "The members of this union determine our policy and we resent the attempted inter-ference by outside bodies in the internal affairs of a free and indepenent union. If this situation was happening in Poland, people would be screaming about state interference."

The union insists that 80 per cent of its 180,000 miners are out on strike, with 131 pits hit by the dispute.

Mr Scargill brushed aside comments by the Prime Mininster and other Cabinet ministers that power cuts were unlikely for many months. The Labour Party's own statement on the dispute, due to be debated at its conference in Blackpool on Monday, has been amended to satisfy objections from the mineworkers. It is understood that references to a "new" Plan for Coal which could appear to support the policy of Mr MacGregor will be deleted. The section on picket-line violence has been modified to exclude any mention of "violence by a handful of pickets". The stage is also being set for a clash with the High Court over the union's refusal to ballot its members on the strike. Dissident South Yorkshire mineworkers from Manton colliery are seeking a court order compelling the union to hold a secret pithead vote within 28 days.

walls, electric fences, watch towers, sentinels and notices saying "guards have orders to shoot".

Rare photographs smuggled out against the strictest orders by allied servicemen have served as a basis for the scenes and the remarkable likeness. Lord Olivier is filming Wild Geese II, directed by Peter Hunt and produced by Euan Lloyd.

Based on the book, The Square Circle by Daniel Carney, it is the story of a plot hatched by an American television company and an international group of mercenaries to free Hess and smuggle him out of Berlin

Richard Burton, who starred in Wild Geese I, was to have played the leading mercenary. His place has been taken by Edward Fox. The film, to be released early next year, also features Scott Glenn and Barbara Carrera. Security on location is as severe as in Spandau: the company does not want anyone to know how the film ends.

Meanwhile, unseen and unawares, the real Rudolf Hess, who made headlines with his escape to Britain in 1941 to seek an end to the war, continues his lonely daily round as he will - barring unexpected mercy from the Russians - until the end of his life.

etter from the Kharroub

Neighbours wait to start the slaughter

Something terrable hangs over the Kharroub. It is quite palpably there, although the evidence suggests a kind of paradise, a series of villages on low stony hills overlooking the Mediterranean where middle-aged men sit on the balconies of broken villas sipping coffee all morning.

In the succes, there are lazy-eyed dogs and children who watch strangers with amuse-ment rather than suspicion. In the fields, there are delicate, brown-winged butterflies. Even in the blasted electricity sub-station at Siblin, the heavy machine gun lies on a cot, homely and vulnerable, as if war had somehow decided to by-pass the hills and the midday heat The very front line has
